Famed grandparents, Ike and Mamie, with daughter-in-law Barbara Jean and her four children.

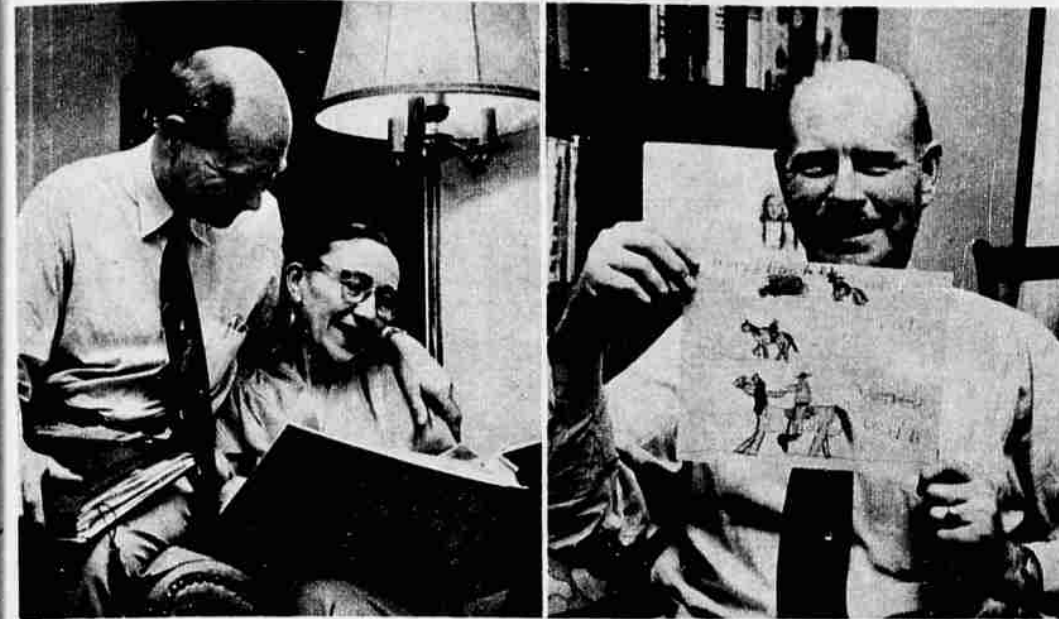

The Other Grandparents

DAVID, BARBARA ANNE, Susan, and Mary are normal American youngsters. They have the usual set of parents and the usual two sets of grandparents. One grandfather is a retired Army colonel who lives in Gainesville, Fla. The other grandfather is a retired Army general who lives in the White House. His name is Dwight D. Eisenhower. Much has been written about one set, very little about the other.

Col. and Mrs. Percy Thompson, however, are just as proud of their grandchildren as are the President and the First Lady. They consider them the cutest, handsomest, most lovable, most intelligent children ever born. They keep scrapbooks of their exploits, including several of David's famous drawings.

The Thompsons live quietly in Gainesville, but frequently travel to Washington, D.C., where their daughter, Barbara Jean, and son-in-law, Maj. John Eisenhower, are stationed. While there, they visit their in-laws at the White House. Small talk seldom involves politics, just "family chitchat." On one point both the Eisenhowers and Thompsons agree: at least one of their grandchildren is quite capable of growing up to be President of the United States.

The "other" grandparents are Col. and Mrs. Percy Thompson, not as renowned as the Eisenhowers but just as proud of the children. Thompson (right) shows David's art.

The Thompsons, who combine retirement with college studies, are firm Ike boosters.
