Ike Expected To Continue Offensive Against More Anti-Recession Steps

Washington—President Eisenhower, with an eye on the returning Congress, will continue his offensive against further anti-recession measures, administration leaders predicted today.

These sources said the President was apprehensive the law-makers will descend on the capital next week in a mood to slash taxes quickly.

The Chief Executive was understood to be considering suggestions that he go directly to the people with a plank warning that hasty tax reduction and unduly large federal spending might bring on inflation more painful than the current recession.

This is the administration's present position on the recession.

a decision on tax reduction now or possibly for weeks. If such a decision is reached, late May seems the earliest probable time.

No Big Public Works
Public works: This is no time for a big program. Such things move too slowly to ease unemployment and stimulate business in less than several months.

Deficit: Experts don't hope for much lower than a $2 billion federal deficit this fiscal year; much more in 1959 and for years to come if Congress continues to appropriate large amounts to turn the economy upward.

Wages and prices: Restraint on the part of business and labor is indicated. Business particularly can do a lot more to help itself with better salesmanship, more attractive price policies and offering more attractive goods. Labor should consider new wage demands in the light of what they might do to prices.

Economy in Government: Congress can help reduce the deficit by going along with administration suggestions for savings in government operation.

Budget Director Maurice H. Stans, in some of the bluntest language yet used by an administration official, laid current policy on the line Wednesday night in a speech at Houston, Tex. Asserting there must be an eventual day of reckoning for deficit financing, he declared:

"Unbalanced national budgets are like pants without suspenders. You can't keep them up forever."
Stans said "Large public works programs are not the right answer for the country now" because "what we get from these slow-moving projects are bigger budgets later on, when that may be the last thing we want."

Selective Tax Cut
With a big "if," he said that should conditions "reach the point where a large scale shot in the arm seems needed, a selective tax cut ought to come first."

The United Press reported April 1 that administration fiscal experts foresaw a possibility of a deficit for fiscal 1958, which ends this June 30, of between $2 billion and $3 billion Stans estimated in his Houston speech the deficit would be at least a billion dollars over the $400 million estimated in January. He added this did not take into consideration the expected fall-off in tax collections.

Openly criticizing Congress for not paying sufficient attention to administration recommendations for economizing, he declared:

"By turning on vast new programs for spending, it has moved far away from any hope of balanced budgets for 1959 and possibly several more years."

Indications that the government may speed up military orders helped the aircrafts. Gains of around a point appeared in Boeing, Chance Vought and Douglas.
