

Buried Treasure

by Pinkney Gage

Name Your Own Price for Wrongly Captioned Stamp

So far as is known, the government destroyed all the stamps it had printed with an erroneous caption in the Panama Pacific Exposition series. But it didn't destroy at least three of the original die impressions of the stamp, and therefore it is quite possible that some of the stamps themselves escaped.

If so, the value will be tremendous for whoever finds one. The stamp is the two-cent, carmine colored item in the series commemorating the exposition at San Francisco in 1915.

The error is in naming the picture that appears on the stamp of the authorized issue. The correct name of the picture is the Gatun Locks, of the Panama Canal.

The mistake consisted of naming the picture as the "Miguel Locks."

When government officials discovered the error, they not only destroyed the large stock of stamps already printed but the plates as well. They then altered the die so it would have the correct inscription and rushed the job of printing the proper replacements.

Despite their precautions, however, at least three of the die proofs of the miscaptioned stamp were not destroyed.

Since the value of one of those proofs today, as given in Scott's Specialized Catalogue of U.S. stamps, is $1500, it is evident that the value of one of the stamps printed from the die with the erroneous caption would be even greater.

Recognition of such a stamp would be easy enough. The only difference between it and the authorized issue is in the caption itself.

CURRIER & IVES DATES CLEVELAND'S CAMPAIGN

Tom removed a picture from the wall. "This is a campaign print that Currier & Ives put out in 1888, when Grover Cleveland ran for his second term as President. As you'll recall, he was defeated. Take a look at it."

The picture, captioned "John Bull and His Friend Cleveland," was a typical campaign message. On one side was John Bull against a background of smoking factories and busy workmen. Opposite stood Grover Cleveland against a background of smokeless factory chimneys and idle men.

In small type below the caption, John Bull was saying, "Mr. Cleveland, keep my factories going if the rest of mankind starve." The American President's answer read, "I am proud of your approval, Mr. Bull, and am doing my best to serve you."

Someone said that he didn't get the connection, that Cleveland was advocating free trade and the high tariff party beat him in 1888.

"Sure," Tom agreed. "And Cleveland staged a comeback in 1892 and won another four years. But the point I wish to make is this:

Tom said he had bought the print at an auction for $50. "I understand that $35 is the usual price for it," he said, "but I got carried away somewhat."

MARK TWAIN BOOKS FIRST SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION

Ted is in the premium business. He supplies premiums to firms that use them as business stimulants—whether it be selling magazine subscriptions or increasing the sales of a breakfast food.

As a result he had a wide variety of interests, but I didn't expect it to be so wide that I would find him laughing over a copy of Mark Twain's "Roughing It."

"It's what the buyer wrote on the title page," Ted replied. "And what tickles me so is that Mark Twain was in effect selling his books as a premium deal. The buyer of this one took the book as means of getting chances on a house and lot."

Ted was quite right. I had never realized it before, but as it said on the title page, the book was "issued by subscription only and was not for sale in book stores." In other words, back in 1872, the American Publishing Co., of Hartford, Conn., was using book agents exclusively, and they used everything they could think of.

As for the book itself, it looked as if it might be a first edition. I suggested the possibility.

"That's the first thing I thought of," Ted said, "and I didn't buy it until I was sure it was not for sale."

How he found it was a first was by checking it against a reference work in the library. He found that the "y" in the first word of Chapter I should be perfect—in subsequent issues with the 1872 date it is broken—and since his copy had a perfect "y," he knew he had a first issue of the first edition.

And he also looked up the price records and found that $20 was about half what the book should bring in view of its good condition.

Ohio Wesleyan Has Grade System

Delaware, Ohio—Ohio Wesleyan university students will have two grades to strive for instead of just one under a program beginning next September.
The faculty voted unanimously to grade students on their ability to write as well as the subject matter to insure that no student graduates without the ability to write the English language properly.
The grade for writing will be either "S" for satisfactory, "U" for unsatisfactory, or "N" for no opportunity to observe.
Two unsatisfactory grades in composition in two or more courses, or one in the required humanities subject, means the student must take a proficiency examination. Failure to pass the test means the student must take a non-credit remedial training in composition.
