

Dr. Dean S. Carder, first man to record the first atom bomb explosion on a seismograph, visited his mother, Mrs. Cora Carder, 607 West Eighth street, in Medford last week. Dr. Carder, who travels all over the world in connection with his work as seismologist with the United States Department of Commerce, Bureau of Coast and Geodetic Survey, here examines a piece of film on which are recorded the earth's tremors resulting from an atom bomb blast.

Department Seismologist Visits Relatives in City

Medford visitor last week was Dr. Dean S. Carder, seismologist with the United States Department of Commerce, Bureau of Coast and Geodetic Survey, who was visiting his mother, Mrs. Cora Carder, 607 West Eighth street, here.

Dr. Carder, who lives in Washington, D.C., recently returned from a trip to Australia where he assisted seismologists in that country determine sites for dams for a two billion dollar hydro electric water power development project.

He served as consultant to Australian seismologists in determining locations of earthquake activity and advise on the types of construction of dams that are near earth faults.

The seismologist makes precision surveys of land soundings of seaways for protection of commerce. During the year he tries to locate earthquake centers throughout the world. The information is pooled with other countries, he reported. The visitor, first man to record the first atom bomb explosion on a seismograph, has also recorded vibrations from world nuclear explosives through the earth. Information gained from the study of these sound waves helps scientists determine the composition of the earth's center.

In addition to visiting Australia recently, Dr. Carder also visited Europe, Asia, Tasmania, and New Zealand with side trips to New Guinea. The doctor explained that good will resulted from this trip and felt that mutual assistance between countries improved international relations.

Dr. Carder was born in Medford and is a graduate of Medford High school.

Dr. Carder gave an illustrated lecture for a Shipments class of First Methodist church Friday evening. The lecture was on Australia, Tasmania, Borneo and the Fiji islands and the pictures included some unusual close-up shots of a volcano in action.

Uses of Climbers, Vines Described by Gardener

By EDNA KING MANDEVILLE

There are a number of reasons for planting climbers or vines, as they may also be called. Today I'd like to point out some of them, and show how a climber may be used to advantage in almost any garden.

Of course, the climber is particularly useful when wind or dust are to be excluded or an unsightly view concealed. A flowering climber may be used to cover an unattractive tree stump or bare slope, and may actually create a spot of beauty where once there existed only an eyesore.

Climbers, however, should not be considered merely for use as a "cover-up," for their beauty and growth habits can add a great deal to the charm of the garden, even though there is no need to cover anything. Their foliage often makes climbers especially adaptable for use as background, and garden flowers are more effective when seen against this type of setting.

Views out of a garden may distract from the beauty of the flowers themselves, and such screening tends to concentrate attention on the real charm of your garden.

Focal Point

If the garden lacks a focal point, here again the climber may be your answer. One interesting arrangement for this purpose is to place a climber-covered trellis behind a garden seat. Such an addition is not only attractive but actually invites use by its impression of restfulness. Where there is a path leading to a garage or tool house, there may be an excellent reason for using a vine-covered pergola to soften the effects of the building. The pergola, however, should be used as a passageway from one place to another, thereby lending meaning to its existence. At a summer-home, the climber may be used as an attractive and practical means of providing shade for porch or patio.

While I've given a few of the best reasons for considering climbers in your garden, there are many more, of course. Perhaps the following list of climbing varieties, together with their suggested uses, will give you further ideas for improving your garden.

Kudzu Vine

Of the perennials, the Kudzu vine is an excellent choice where shade, screening, or a windbreak is needed. This vine, belonging to the pea family, grows quite quickly to a height of some 30 feet. It has large three-part leaves, somewhat lobed in shape, which are perfect for producing a dense foliage. This characteristic, plus its rapid growth habit, makes it perfect for most shade and screening uses. The Kudzu vine is hardy, too, except in a few northernmost parts of the United States.

Another good climber is the perennial sweet pea (Lathyrus), which reaches a height of about six feet and is adaptable in some instances for screening or dust elimination. The flowers are showy and quite often are grown for beauty alone. They are red, pink and white, similar to the annual sweet pea, though they are not fragrant.

Hyacinth Bean

One of the most rapidly growing of all annual climbers is the annual hyacinth bean, which climbs to about 15 feet. Its bright green foliage is most attractive, and the handsome purple and white flowers appear in large clusters from midseason until late in the year. Another good climber in the annual group is the scarlet runner bean, growing to about 10 feet and producing a dense green foliage, which is especially beautiful as a backdrop for clusters of red flowers. The pods from this vine are edible when very young, as are the shell beans which the pods produce. Both of these annual vines are useful for screening and windbreak purposes.

For adding beauty to the garden, there are the annual cypress vine and the cardinal climber. Both are particularly suited for use on trellis, fence or wall. The cypress vine climbs to about eight feet, with a foliage that gives the impression of fine moss covered with tiny red and white stars. The cardinal climber reaches 20 feet quite rapidly, and has beautiful fern-like foliage covered with fiery-red flowers that last from mid-summer till late in the season, lending beauty and color wherever used.

In my next article, I shall consider other varieties having climbing characteristics.

Color Goes To Milady's Feet

By United Press
Color goes to milady's feet for spring. At the New York Fashion Group's showing of import collections, some of the shoe colors were a sharp contrast to dresses and suits. A violet-colored dress was worn with hot orange satin, T-strap slippers. Yellow silk pumps went with a rosy red coat. Bitter green peau de soie shoes were worn with a pink wool suit.

Paris also shows umbrellas and hats in matching prints for summer.

Economic note: One national magazine (Seventeen) says that teen-age girls going back to school spent almost $750 million on apparel alone within a 60-day period last year. It estimated that the girl entering her first year of college spends an average of $364.13 on clothes.

Women's Board To Advise Chain On Men's Wear

New York — Now it's a men's wear chain seeking feminine advice on style. The chain, Broadstreet's, has formed a 10-member women's advisory board, to keep it informed on style trends and ways to make shopping easier. The firm said it set up the panel for a good business reason — women buy some 75 per cent of all men's furnishings.

This sophisticated evening ensemble by Ceil Chapman is one of many beautiful fashions in the all-cotton wardrobe of Jean Carter, 1958 Maid of Cotton. The slim sheath and graceful stole glow with subtle colored flowers printed on Everglaze cotton satin. Like her other fashions, the dress is packable!

This young nurse looks quite professional in her Red Cross uniform. The apron and cap were made from white cotton bags once used for packaging flour. Cotton bags, which come in bright prints as well as white and solid colors, also provided the fabric for the sick doll.

Are You A Worrier?

Almost everyone is worried about something at some time. Money, love, family, job, calories, flying saucers—all of these raise anxiety in greater or less degree.

Worry, anxiety, and fear cannot be eliminated by a simple "Forget it!" They represent only to an orderly approach which considers both cause and effect.

Worries, generally speaking, fall into two categories: those based upon objective fact and those which are largely emotional in origin. Each worrier must determine which is his nemesis. He must ask himself, "Is my trouble outside of me, or inside of me?"

Many fears can be dissipated by a rational approach, following a step-by-step procedure. Deep anxiety states, of course, are usually beyond self-help and respond only to specialized treatment.

Supposing you are a habitual worry-bird. What can you do?

Here at The American Institute of Family Relations in Los Angeles, we suggest:

1. Admit what you are afraid of. This in itself does much to drain off its tension and frees you to work upon it, rather than burying it to cause later difficulty.
2. Outline your worry. Just what is the problem? Is it real? What is the worst outcome?

To keep a house plant from turning toward the light, place foil paper behind it. The foil serves as a reflector and keeps the plant growing straight.

Stop guessing at facts — use the convenient telephone information service at the Medford Public library, soda.

Medford Public library has books on all the major games and sports.

come possible? How likely is that outcome? How much of the difficulty can you discount as imagination? Remember that the "worst" — whatever that may be — rarely happens, except in fancy.

3. Act. Do something about the problem. Often a difficulty disappears when even a small amount of action is brought to bear upon it.

4. Seek help if you find the problem beyond your powers. 5. Once a problem has been worked through to the best of your ability, close the matter. Approach the future with confidence and put the past behind you.

These five simple steps may not solve all your worry problems — but they can help!
