Study Highway Plan In Southwest Oregon

Cave Junction—More than 250 northern Californians and southern Oregonians met recently in Crescent City, Calif. to discuss better access to southwestern Oregon's rich lumber and mining regions in adjoining Josephine county.

It was pointed out that the existing 85-mile highway which serves as the only connection between the two counties, is too high, narrow and crooked for present-day traffic, plus future demands.

A plan to realign the highway in the Siskiyou mountains was presented by California State Sen. Randolph Collier, who conducted the meeting. Approximately 60 linear feet of large-scale contour maps were posted in the auditorium, tracing a survey route of the proposed realignment.

According to the survey, the new road would leave the present Highway 99 (Redwood highway) at the southern foot of the mountain range, pass under Hazelview Summit through a tunnel, and rejoin the present road near the Oregon-California line. Estimated cost of the tunnel is $2,000,000. The complete realignment job, is estimated at $5 million, depending on how far south the new road extends.

The proposed road would eliminate all but 10 of the 144 curves on the mountainous portion of the Redwood highway. If the tunnel were built, it would be 1400 feet long, and would do away with some three miles of steep curves and narrow switchbacks which slow up traffic on Hazelview summit and create snow hazards during the winter. Collier said it would also reduce the grade from the present 7 to 6 per cent.

Since all the proposed improvements would be in California, the initial drive, Sen. Collier said, will be to get the California State Highway department to adopt the plan and construct and maintain the project as a part of the state highway system. The Senator, who is chairman of the interim committee on highways, said he hoped this might happen within the next few years.
