The Gardener's Guide to Gadgetry

Got a lawn with a pale personality?

THE NATION'S GARDENS are sure to produce one crop this year—a bountiful harvest of brand-new gadgets.

Gadget-happy Americans, having filled kitchens and autos with mechanical devices, are now turning their ingenuity to the back yard—its stubborn weeds, unruly grass, and anemic botanical specimens. The result is a marketful of labor-saving products, all promising the part-time tiller of the soil a life of beauty without backache.

Three-in-one tools, particularly simple ones, have special appeal to efficiency-minded home gardeners. One favorite uses a simple locking wing nut to adjust a half-moon blade into positions for edging the lawn, scooping furrows, or weeding. Merely loosen the nut, move the blade into the cutting angle desired, tighten the nut, and hoe away.

Another triple-threat invention is designed to fertilize soil, kill weeds and crabgrass, and destroy soil insects automatically. A trisected chamber attaches to a regular hose or sprinkler and "shoots" bulletlike cartridges of fertilizer, weed killer, and insecticide into the lawn.

The battle against lawn pests, of course, has produced an arsenal of weapons, including a "push-chart" liquid spreader which operates on the one-wheel drive principle. As the wheels turn, rollers compress a hose and force out solutions in a fine, fan-shaped spray. The manufacturer says you can cover about 100 square feet in a leisurely three-minute walk around your lawn.

A more direct means of attack features an aerosol spray attached to the end of a pole. A trigger connects to the handle. When you spot a dandelion, there's no stoop or strain—just blast away.

A similar concept permits gardeners to reseed bare spots without resorting to figure-slimming exercise. In this case, the pole attachment has two sides. With a spiked stamper, you loosen the earth; then, with a small roller, you finish up the job.

Even lawn sprinkling has been simplified. There's a portable, oscillating sprinkler, for example, which can be dialed to cover any specific part of the lawn, automatically avoiding walks, drives, and other areas you want to keep dry. If you insist on doing it yourself, there's a caddy-cart to lug around the hose and see that it doesn't trip you or get kinked.

But next to a prize-winning array of delphiniums, the item that most gardeners dream about is the all-around "power package." Usually this is a power lawn mower which has graduated into such chores as grading, seeding, and even hauling loads up to 1,000 pounds, excluding the gardener who sits like a bulldozer-driver at its controls.

The power mower, whatever its size, has come a long way since its modest beginning. The most notable advances have been in safety features. Blades now are protected by special guards, brakes are quick-acting, and "dead-man controls" cut off power the instant something goes amiss.

All the wonders of mechanics and nature, however, sometimes fail to produce the Technicolor lawn most homemakers dream of, so chemists have come up with a plant food to "tint" your grass a rich green. The producers say you merely sprinkle this special fertilizer on your yard and within 72 hours you'll have a more natural-looking lawn. The coloring is water-fast and won't rub off.

If you still have trouble with your lawn and garden, maybe the best things you can buy are some gardening gloves recently marketed—they've got a pair of built-in green thumbs.
