Flood Control Said Not Justification For Dams on Rogue

Hatch emphasized more than once that a dam or dams on the Rogue river could never be justified on the basis of flood control alone.

Some of the facts brought out during a question period were that the time in which to pay back the cost of the dam or dams would be either 40 or 50 years, although there have been cases of a 100-year pay period being granted. The sale of power will help pay the cost of the dam, and the federal government does not need to be reimbursed for flood control.

Fish Could Be Planted

Fish could be planted in the upper reservoir lakes and there would be excellent trout fishing, with recreational facilities being built up around the lake. An irrigation canal will be built on each side of the valley from the Trail diversion dam and the lake would be open to such concessions as boat landings and stores that could be reached by a road which would encircle the lake. The engineers would provide for new roads where backwaters would flood existing roads. In the three-dam alternative the water would back up Elk creek approximately four to five miles and up Big Butte creek approximately four miles to Clark creek. A dam on Trail creek would never be economically feasible.

The approximate time required to build a big dam is from three to five years, Hatch said. In closing he said that the recommendations of the Army engineers are expected to be ready some time this year and that further public hearings would be held then.

He urged residents to attend future meetings to make their views known, or to write a letter setting forth their opinions so they can be read and considered at the meetings.

He said that the questions that he had heard voiced many times on the possibility of dams on the river leaving huge mud banks during certain seasons, and said that owing to the steep slopes of the terrain there would be little likelihood of such mud banks. He told of the Fern Ridge reservoir

What Is The Law?

Tavern Owner's Wife Cowed By Dilworth's Hatchet

Dilworth came to a tavern at a very late hour. It was closed but he beat on the door and demanded some wine. The tavern owner's wife opened the window, leaned out and told him that the tavern was closed for the night. Dilworth thereupon hurled a hatchet at her; and although it missed her, she was greatly frightened. The tavern owner's wife sought to recover damages for this fright.

This was in England in 1348. The court involved was one of the first to recognize that in such a case an "assault" had been committed. The wife was awarded the damages she sought. In similar case today, over 600 years later, practically all courts would arrive at the same conclusion.

Today's courts point out the essence of an "assault" is the fear or apprehension created in the mind of the person assaulted. This, of course, must be a reasonable reaction, and the wrongdoer must intend to do the act which causes it. Usually the courts require that the wrongdoer have the apparent ability to cause a harmful or offensive contact with the person claiming to have been assaulted.

In a case about 30 years ago, a tenant was moving from her apartment when the landlord appeared on the scene. Brandishing a pistol, he threatened to shoot the tenant if she persisted in moving from the apartment. He actually pointed the pistol toward her. When she sued the landlord, he claimed that the pistol was not loaded and so he could not have shot her. The court, in holding the landlord liable, pointed out that the tenant did not know that the pistol was unloaded and so was certainly reasonable in being apprehensive for her immediate safety.

Although it is necessary in such a case that the wrongdoer intend to do the act, it is not necessary that he intend to frighten any specific person in order to be held liable.

Students Assaulted

If Dick threatens a teacher by waving a hand grenade and shouting he is going to throw it into the classroom, he will have assaulted all the students who become frightened with the teacher's even though Dick had no intent nor desire to harm or frighten the students.

In an early case one man said to another, as he put his hand on his sword, "If the court were not in session, I would not take such language from you." It was decided that there was no assault because the statement clearly indicated that he would do nothing immediately. Therefore, the act could not make one reasonably apprehensive for his immediate safety.

Most courts agree with this. However, if the person making such a statement is so upset or angry that he cannot be trusted as responsible, then his threat may well be an assault.

Rebels Challenge Other Resolutions

Although badly outnumbered, the rebels in varying numbers appeared from time to time to challenge other resolutions, especially one lambasting fluoridation. One popped up and warned that the DAR was being used as a front for screwballs who oppose fluoridation. The warning went unheeded after another Daughter reported: "Fluoridation and the gun are the two weapons used by Russia in prison camps. When they can't control them with fluoridation, they shoot them."

Another added that through fluoridation the "internationalists plan to weaken all human beings so that they can work out their plans for world government." The anti-fluoridation resolve carried heavily.

Then there was the resolution opposing registration of firearms for fear invading Communists would obtain lists and seize citizens owning guns. Those who sought to explain that the FBI and police use registration to fight criminals were easily overrun by ladies who said it was more important to protect Americans who wished to protect their homes with firearms. Cannonading and musket fire from the DAR Congress momentarily drowned out talk of H-bombs in the Congress sitting on Capitol Hill.

On the final resolution, rebel opponents finally won the day, causing the President General and her staff to sputter in momentary confusion when only six Daughters stood up to endorse this resolve. Had this resolution carried, it would have condemned a proposed new bridge across the Potomac river near Lincoln Memorial just down Constitution ave. from the DAR hall.

"Please let us have our bridge," pleaded a Daughter from Virginia. They did. And it's a good thing, because if things are as bad as the rest of the DAR resolutions picture them, we'll need it as a jumping off place.
