

Family Council

Helen N. — I've got double mother-in-law trouble.

Arnold N. — We owe something to my sister.

Helen N. — I'm having mother-in-law trouble — only with me, it's two mothers-in-law.

I am ready to show every respect and consideration to my husband's mother, but when it comes to his sister, I draw the line. This older sister is single and lives with her mother. She takes a very critical attitude toward me, tries to boss me around, yet wants to be invited along on all our vacations, evenings out, etc. Last summer, both she and Arnold's mother came on our vacation and I felt as though I had two mothers-in-law on my back at every moment.

I have two young children to bring up and this is making me a nervous wreck.

Arnold N. — I know my sister Celia can be a pest, but Helen should consider this — if Celia didn't stay with my mother and take care of her, we would have to have Mother living with us. And Mother really can be difficult.

I feel very sorry about Celia. She was married at 17 to a heel and that kind of soured her on men and life in general. She never wanted to marry again after this guy ran out on her. She has a hard life, catering to Mother's needs, and I feel we should treat her well and provide her with a little change and entertainment.

If I didn't try to do something for Celia, she would be left with nothing but work.

The Council: We agree that Arnold has a duty to fulfill in relation to his mother and sister, but we think he has gone a little overboard on exactly what his responsibilities are.

It is certainly unfair to burden the sister with the entire responsibility for the care of the mother. Arnold owes his sister respect. He should be willing to take his mother into his home occasionally while his sister gets a chance to have evenings out or a vacation with her friends.

But Arnold should not assume the responsibility for providing his sister with the only entertainment and change in her meager life. He may feel sympathy for her, but it is not his business to make up to her for her own "sour" attitude. Nothing he can do would bring her any real happiness in life. Pleasure and relaxation will not come to her until she is ready to give something of herself to others. She must find her own friends and own interests.

Arnold is actually doing his sister a disservice by allowing her to depend upon him for her good times. She cannot enjoy herself when he takes her along out of a sense of duty. She needs to win her way among people. When she has earned the right to be liked and invited to join a group, she can participate heartily, feeling that she is really wanted. Among outsiders, she will also feel a responsibility for contributing to the pleasure of the outing and will not give free rein to her surly feelings.

We also wonder whether Arnold's mother is quite as helpless as Arnold seems to believe. Celia may have made this woman more helpless than necessary out of her own need for a purpose in life.

Common Air Has Experts Stumped

Chicago—No one really knows what air is, according to two design engineers at the General Dynamics Corp. Convair division, San Diego, Calif.

The engineers recently presented a paper on pneumatics systems before a conference on industrial hydraulics at the Illinois Institute of Technology.

T. H. Chadwick and Paul L. Brady said they had discovered that air, one of the most common things we know, has the experts stumped.

Scientists find air unpredictable at high pressures, they said. It is so unpredictable the engineers working with high pressure systems have had to design "new and complicated techniques."

High pressure air, or gas, systems are desirable for aircraft because they weigh much less than comparable liquid systems and they are generally not as greatly affected by low temperatures.

It is estimated the current population of Asia is about 1,300 million persons.
