Some Dipnetting Okayed For Indian Fishermen

Portland — Owen Panner, Bend attorney for the Warm Springs Indians, said Saturday that a new Indian agreement with Oregon and Washington permitting some salmon dipnetting on the Columbia river would have little effect on fish runs in the stream.

The agreement would permit four Indian tribes to continue their historic fishing activities and to sell their catches subject to certain limitations.

But Panner said "any catches will be negligible. They'll hardly pay for the gasoline to drive to the river but it will enable Indians to follow their ancient ways of fishing if they wish."
Tribes affected by the agreement are the Warm Springs, Yakima, Umatilla and Nez Perce. The pact still must be submitted to tribal councils for approval.
Panner pointed out that since Cello Falls has been flooded behind the Dalles dam there are few spots along the river where an Indian dipnetter can catch fish with his ancient methods.
Under the agreement, the Indians will not engage in gillnetting above Bonneville dam. Whites would still be limited to the hook and line.
Indian dipnetters may fish from The Dalles dam area downstream to the Bridge of the Gods but they must observe closed areas around state and Federal fish hatcheries.
