Can't Write Book in a Column

I wish when, after reading one of my columns, people feel like reaching for pen and paper to give me a good scolding, they would stop to do one of several things. One, they might reread the article to see if they got correctly what I said; in many a case they don't. Two, they might wait for a few hours, or a couple of days to cool off, like I do on the rare occasions when I get angry. Three, my readers might see that when I note, let us say, that some epileptics have a quick temper, or some stutterers have stuttering relatives, I didn't say that all have; I wasn't talking about the many nice, friendly and good-tempered epileptics, or the stutterers who know of no one similarly afflicted in their family. Four, my readers should realize that when I write a column I cannot write an encyclopedic article on the subject; some details must be left for another day.

Five, when I differ with some psychiatrists, I may not have space in which to say how thoroughly I agree with many others, many of whom are to me dear and honored friends and teachers. Six, when I say how important heredity is, I may not have space in which to go on to say how important environment can be. Some day I'll write a column on that. When I say that neuroses and minor psychoses, epilepsies, and mental retardation are often inherited, I didn't say they always are. I know all about the cases in which the disease was caused by an encephalitis or an injury to the brain at birth. Not Necessarily Incurable.

Seven, when I say that a particular disease is often inherited I did not say that this fact makes it incurable. Many people accuse me angrily of having said this, but I never did, and never will. I know of several inherited illnesses, like diabetes and gout, many of which are easily kept under control. Many noble people I know have fought off insanity all their days. Eight, when I speak of the hereditary nature of mental troubles, I haven't the space in which to summarize the enormous old and new literature that strongly supports my view, or to quote the many statements of the old psychiatrists and the fine geneticists who have taught me so much; or I cannot take the space in which to publish abstracts of the histories of the hundreds of patients I have seen, whose stories overwhelmingly support my view.

Surely, aren't we humans funny when we put our prejudices or our slight experience — perhaps in one case — against a university professor's mass knowledge, gathered during a lifetime of reading and study and research? Every month several persons write to say, "You are all wrong about there being no diet for arthritis. I ate no meat for two years and cured my sore joints." One case of course, does not prove a thing.

People are funny, they are also very nice. So many persons, after writing me an angry letter, will add, as a cute P.S., "There, I am glad that is off my chest. I feel better now, and I hope you don't mind my outburst. Actually, I like you, and I love your spirit as shown in your column." Since mentioned the fact that some persons scold me violently, dozens of sweet people have written to comfort me; they said they resented the idea of anyone's scolding me! Bless their kind hearts.

Distressing Letter

I think I once said, I do not mind disagreement or even abuse; that is natural, and to
