Alaska Bill Clears Hurdle

Washington—A hotly fought Alaskan statehood bill cleared its first major hurdle in the house today when members agreed to consider it.
The house rejected, on a 217 to 172 roll call, efforts of statehood opponents to kill the bill by refusing to take it up.
The action meant only that the measure would be debated, probably at length. However, the test vote lent encouragement to statehood supporters that Alaska may become the 49th state.

Speaker Sam Rayburn rejected efforts of opponents to block the bill's consideration on assorted points of order. He recognized Rep. Wayne Aspinall (D-Colo.) to call it up under house rules making statehood a matter of "privilege."
The procedure was used because the rules committee, which controls the flow of ordinary legislation from other committees to the floor, had refused to clear the measure for House debate.
