Greatest Problem Concerning Family Desertion Falls on Court

This is the third in a series of five articles on family desertion.

By R. L. FISHBEEK

Family desertion is a many-sided problem that requires more than imprisonment of the deserter, and giveaway programs to his wife and family, if it is to be solved.

The greatest burden of coping with the problem falls on the courts, whose job it is to try deserters and enforce support agreements. But how should the courts fulfill their obligation?

Since the evolution of state reciprocal support legislation, the apprehension and punishment of deserters has become more effective. Deserters can no longer run away from their responsibilities merely by slipping from state to state.
But the mere existence of this new type of legislation will not insure its success.

Cooperative Effort

The states must put forth an intensive, cooperative effort, to get the most out of the reciprocal support law.
Enforcement of the law must be immediate and swift, if it is to be of real value to deserted persons. The deserter usually runs away without warning, leaving the wife to feed and clothe her family with little or no income.

What is needed to bridge the gap between the family, the laws and the courts? One connecting system that has been tried and proved is the family court of Toledo, Ohio.
This court has jurisdiction over all family matters from delinquency to divorce, including desertion.

The first family court, with jurisdiction over both adults and children, was created in Hamilton county, Ohio, as a division of the court of common pleas. For the first time divorce and alimony cases, and all others arising under the juvenile court act, including cases of failure to provide and of contributing to the dependency or delinquency of children, were brought before one court.

A central record system, a clinic and staff were added to the court for administration.
The movement for family support of the National Parole and Probation association, the courts has continued with the National Association of Legal Aid organizations and other social agencies.

In states and counties not having family courts, the procedure for handling divorce, desertion and dependency cases is much more complex.
In Milwaukee county, Wis., an entirely separate juvenile court was established by statute in 1953, so that a present, jurisdiction over custody of children of divorced parents is in one court, and jurisdiction over dependent, delinquent and neglected children is in an entirely separate court.

As admitted by Milwaukee county court personnel, the court structure "aggravates the handling of personal problem cases arising out of family breakdown by setting up a conflict of jurisdiction between two courts."

Value of Court

The value of the integrated family court can best be illustrated by the court of common pleas, Toledo, Ohio, which has been considered a model for the country. Here, under one roof, the six member judges have authority over all family matters. About 25 different types of sections, including problems of support, separations, custody matters, neglect and dependency, are handled by the court.

Attached to the court, which is approximately equivalent to the former domestic relations court and the supreme court combined, is a staff of 89 family experts, including clinical psychiatrists, marriage counselors and trained social workers. The elected judge of this court is not rotated to different courts, so he is, or becomes, a specialized official. If a family is breaking down or if children of divorce get into trouble, the judge has before him the complete family record to help him get at the truth and the best solution.

Such a court not only saves time, trouble and expense, but most of all it helps prevent mistakes on the part of courts and court workers, according to Judge Paul W. Alexander of the Toledo court.

The family court has family experts to handle the social problems which are nearly always a factor in desertion cases. In this way the social casework agencies aren't troubled with court cases, which would interfere with their normal daily routine. The court takes care of both the emotional and sociological problems associated with all of the desertion cases that enter its jurisdiction.

The ideal socio-legal approach to the desertion problem can be reached if the family court program can be correctly established. Rehabilitation of the deserter can be accomplished more effectively while he is being held for the court. The deserter can be told what his running away really means to the family; the significance of his actions can be impressed on him.

The deserter as well as the deserted can be counseled.
Reconciliation of the deserter with his family can also be attempted at the same time that he is being questioned.

Family courts in Oregon would not only cut down desertions, but would help stem the rising incidence of divorce. Institution of a uniform family court system would not mean the closing down of all other social work, but if family court cases could be completely handled by specialists in the field, the resultant quality of treatment would probably be much more beneficial.

problem in Jackson county.

Truck Damages Station

By RUTH ROUSCH

Cave Junction—An Oregon state division of highways truck and trailer, in attempting to drive through the low lane of the Redwood Highway Inspection station Friday, caused considerable damage to the overhead door at the station when the trailer tank hit the structure. The trailer also suffered considerable damage.

Mr. and Mrs. Arly Winchester, newcomers to the valley from Los Angeles, are building a home on Caves Highway.

The Rev. Denning and son, Timothy, are in Eugene this week, looking over the vocational school where Timothy is enrolled for classes in aeronautics this fall and to arrange for board and room.

The Cave Junction Community school will have their Sunday School promotion day Sunday, June 29, according to Mrs. Marvin Cross, Sunday school superintendent.

Some 50 children will receive certificates and merit awards during the Sunday school hours. A little program will be presented.

The George Martin Jrs. have returned from a vacation in Washington.

Mr. and Mrs. Harold Martin and children, Larry, Dwain, Bruce, Nickey and Marilyn, have moved to the valley from Grants Pass, taking residence in the former Earl Morris place.

GAZING WIDE-EYED, and slightly skeptical, two baby gorillas get acquainted with some milk and their new surroundings at the St. Louis, Mo., zoo. The pair, a male and female, are the latest additions to the zoo's gorilla population, now numbering five. (UPI Telephoto)
