

Couture Group Says Fashion For Fall Sexy—Not Sacky

By GAY PAULEY
UPI Women's Editor
New York—(UPI)—The men have won the battle to keep their women looking sexy instead of sacky.

The de-curving silhouette of the gynny sack of last spring is dead.

In its place for fall we have easy-fitting clothes, with what the fashion industry calls fluid lines, which emphasize bosoms and legs. Skirts are shorter than they've been since flapper days, with some designers showing them barely covering the knee.

Who's responsible for the demise of the chemise?

Mostly the men, said the couture group, of the New York Press Institute.

Women Helped, Too
"And many women," it added. This prompted our office wit to compose the following: Said a sack-ridden lady, "Alack!

"My figure looks all out of whack;

"I choose not to sneeze
"At the birds and the bees;
"Please remove this chemise from my back."

"It is clear that the grass roots protests from husbands and taxi drivers . . . have not gone unheeded," said the group in today's "watch for" roundup for fall.

It added that "baggy outlines, bizarre outrigger effects and vated middies have been voted out by the shapes with shape definitely anatomy-conscious . . .

"The bosom and waistline, mourned as lost by many, to be visible and emphasized . . .

May Be Confusing
The roundup said New York collections had been influenced by the French trapeze and the Italian bubble silhouettes of last spring. But it added that these "revolutionary shapes" have been translated and "distilled" to pass the "what-does-it-do-for-me-and-will-my-husband-like-it" tests.

The couture group, made up of 30 leading designers, today began a week-long series of fashion shows for 200 women's and fashion editors from the United States and Canada. The shows have been held semi-annually since 1941.

Although the accent once more is on curves, there are numerous variations on this theme; so many it'll be a confusing fall for the shopper.

The institute said there are "18 different silhouettes derived from the chemise and at least as many variations of the pyramidal outline."

Corn on the Cob Good Baked in Foil

New York—(UPI)—Fresh corn on the cob is especially flavorful when roasted in foil, either on an outdoor grill or in a preheated 425 degree oven.

Husk corn, remove silks and place each ear on a square of aluminum foil. Sprinkle with salt and pepper, top with a thin slice of butter or margarine, and wrap securely by making a double lengthwise fold on top of the ear. Turn up ends, and fold against the corn.

On an outdoor grill, bake 20-25 minutes, or until tender, turning to cook uniformly. Oven-baked corn takes approximately the same baking time, depending on the age of the corn and size of the ears.

Fats and Oils Need Special Summer Care

Fats and oils become rancid when they are exposed to light, air, moisture and heat. Home economists with the Gas Appliance Manufacturers association suggest that bottles that have been opened should be kept tightly covered, under refrigeration. Some oils become cloudy when refrigerated, but a short time at room temperature will restore the original clearness. Olive oil will congeal when held for any length of time in a cold place. It becomes semi-solid, white and thick. This does not change its quality and after a short time at room temperature it will return to its clear fluid state, the home economists say.

For the Show-Off Cook

This simple, zesty dish needs vigorous tossing just before serving. If you like to put on a show, arrange the sauce ingredients artistically on a tray and make the sauce at the table. Cook an 8-ounce package of macaroni in 3 quarts of water for about 10 minutes over a high gas flame. While it's cooking, assemble the following ingredients: 2 cups grated cheddar cheese, ¼ cup chili sauce, 3 table-spoons Worcestershire sauce, ½ cup melted butter, salt and coarsely ground pepper. Drain macaroni and spread on a hot platter. Sprinkle the other ingredients over it and toss vigorously with 2 forks until the sauce coats each piece.

Plastic-Coated Eggs Tested at University

Madison—(UPI)—Plastic-coated eggs tested at the University of Wisconsin show less weight reduction and fewer changes in vitamin content, according to Miss Flora Hanning, a home economist in the college of agriculture.

Miss Hanning said that the plastic solution covering the eggs remained constant in alkalinity content during the first week of storage while alkaline increased in untreated eggs.

The untreated eggs lost as much weight in one week as the plastic-coated eggs lost in a month, she said. The plastic solution has been in use on farms to prevent losses of carbon dioxide and moisture during storage.
