Diary of a Bird Watcher

Thursday, July 10

At Camp Adams, near Molalla, I saw a new bird for my year list, number 193. It was a hermit warbler. Appropriately named, it is a bird of the woods in the foothills and mountains. Its markings, a yellow head and black throat are distinctive and make it easy to recognize. I think I have only seen this bird a couple of times in Jackson county, but it is probably here regularly.

Saturday, July 12

Today we came home from Camp Adams. It was a cooler, pleasanter trip than when we went up. When I head for home I am like a horse heading for the barn. I want to get there quick, not for a bin of oats, but to see my family and take up my neglected work. Such a trip is no time to look for birds. I just packed my binoculars in the trunk and left them there. I'll try to do my bird watching on the by-roads.

Sunday, July 13

I noticed in the correspondence column of the Mail Tribune that someone thinks that the program of eradicating porcupines was so successful a bounty should be placed on English sparrows. I am not fond of the house sparrow myself but I am strongly opposed to putting a bounty on them. Once, when I was feeding birds in the winter I thought I had too many so I started to trap them. I found that I caught the attractive golden crowned sparrows just as easily as the house sparrows. That wasn't so bad as long as I knew the difference and could release them, but one day a Bewick's wren got caught in the trap when I didn't notice it, and died. Then I gave up trapping. Many people would not be able to tell an English sparrow from an immature golden crowned sparrow or some other of our native sparrows.

Besides I think children and young people should be taught to love and cherish our wild life and putting a bounty on some of the creatures doesn't further that teaching. If any birds or animals must be destroyed let it be by adult people who are definitely hurt by them and know what they are doing.

Monday, July 14

J. H. came by and we went up the Dead Indian grade and along that road part of the way toward Lake of the Woods. We also had a doctor friend along who wanted to see what bird watching was like. He said he could see the fascination of it.

We did see some nice birds such as the always gorgeous tanagers, a purple finch with the sun shining on its bright red (not purple) head, a straight-plumed mountain quail with a flock of cute little ones, and swifts flying rapidly over at a speed to justify their name. We went to the spot where we had seen the calliope hummingbird earlier in the season, and there might have been a whole family of them now, but they were streaking through the air at a speed that made them impossible to identify or else hid on the back sides of bushes. The only hummingbird we got a good view of seemed to be of the commoner rufous variety. Once more we failed to see the black-backed woodpecker that I saw up in that area once and have been looking for ever since.

Tuesday, July 15

Before the thunder shower in the evening we had a lot of birds around our place. At this season the birds are beginning to travel more in flocks, some of which may be just family groups, but birds of different species seem to prefer to be near each other. Most conspicuous this afternoon was a family of ash-throated flycatchers. The young ones seemed to look just like the adults which are easily identified by their reddish tails. I think this is one of the most attractive of the flycatchers. Since they do what their name implies—catch flies—most people would consider them useful as well as ornamental. They undoubtedly also get mosquitoes and other noxious insects.

Among the other birds we saw this afternoon were of course robins of which there are a good many speckled breasted young ones now, brown towhees, titmice and a Bewick's wren.

Wednesday, July 16

Being near Hoover lake, as any one could guess, I visited it. The interesting thing I saw this time was two American egrets flying over one of the ponds. I am always happy when I see these beautiful birds in our valley.—T.M.

History Shows Relation Of Ashland Man, Ike

Ashland—President Dwight David Eisenhower and Ashland resident George Benjamin Icenhower share a common great-great-great grandfather. A description of the Eisenhower family history, written by Mrs. Fannie B. Richardson of Greenwood, Ind., points out this fact.

A copy of the history, which traces the diverse genealogy of the Eisenhower family, with at least 15 different spellings of which Icenhower is one, was given to the Southern Oregon college library by George B. Icenhower, an Ashland retail merchant.

The volume starts its historical tracings with a Hans Nicholas Eisenhower, who was born in 1691. When Hans Nicholas migrated to the United States in 1741, he brought his three sons, Peter, Johannes and Martin, with him. Both President Eisenhower and George B. Icenhower are descendants of Peter Eisenhower.

President Eisenhower is descended from Peter's 17th child, Samuel, product of Peter's third marriage. Icenhower's great-great grandfather was Peter's fifth son, Frederick, born of his first marriage.

The manuscript, which was presented unbound, will be bound and inserted into a collection of family and local history which the SOC library is beginning. Miss Myrtle Funkhouser, SOC librarian, said.
