The Medical Roundup

by Walter Adams, Emeritus Consultant in Medicine, Mayo Foundation

Big Strokes
Scores of unhappy people write, asking me if anything can be done for a father or mother who has had a bad stroke. Perhaps it left one side of the body paralyzed, and perhaps it left an aphasia (an inability to talk). Often the son or daughter writes that the parent got decidedly better during the first few weeks, and then no more improvement was seen. Or, perhaps, in the next six months there were better periods when the patient was better and periods when he was worse. Perhaps after a while he had some short spells in which he was dizzy or confused or nauseated, and when apparently he had another stroke—this time a little one.

Usually, I think, most of the improvement after a stroke comes in the first six months, and after that I don't expect to see much betterment. Certainly, after that time, I much doubt if the family should take their loved one from one medical center to another. I do not see how any miracle can be performed. If I, myself, had partly recovered from a stroke and, after six or eight months, had stopped improving, I would not go traveling about the country; I would not expect anywhere to find a remedy or procedure that would help me.

I would know that a part of my brain had been destroyed, and I would know that no medicine could build it up again so that it would function normally. In the first few days, the patient can improve greatly because shock and edema (swelling with fluid) clear away. Then perhaps for six months, normal parts of the brain take over some of the functions of the destroyed area. After that, there seems to be no way in which the remaining damage can be repaired.

Dr. Alvarez hopes his readers will understand that it would be impossible for him to answer requests for information or to attempt to diagnose by mail.

Social Security Bill Wins House Approval
