Career and Marriage Mix Future Homemakers Feel

By TILL HAGERTY
Kansas City, Mo.—UPI—Future Homemakers of America think that the main course in a woman's life—marriage—should be seasoned with education and a career.

The FHA, a national organization of students studying home-making in high schools, held a convention here recently to discuss the value of an education, career opportunities in home economics, becoming better citizens, improving human relations and broadening spiritual values.

Some 450 teen-agers representing 475,000 members throughout the United States, Hawaii and Puerto Rico, and 150 adult advisers attended the sessions, feverishly taking notes to tell the proceedings to their home chapters.

The girls freely expressed their views on the role of education in a career and marriage. At the end of one session, the girls concluded: "Education is the backbone for marriage or career."

The delegates also decided that marriage could be considered a career, or full-time work, but that a wage-earning job was much different.

The consensus was that a working wife should give her home responsibilities precedence over job obligations. And the teen-agers did not approve of a mother going to work until her children were school age.

Pat Stephens, Hot Springs, Ark., president of her state chapter, said the girls, in general, wanted a "formal education, then a career and finally marriage."

Pat said her group rated the three most important factors for a successful marriage as companionship, adaptability and determination that it should succeed.

With the help of adult advisers and other FHA leaders, Pat prepared a questionnaire on vocations. It advised FHA'ers to seek work suitable to their personalities; to select a job within the range of their mental abilities, yet challenge talent to the utmost; to have their talents evaluated by an unprejudiced professional if they wanted a career in the arts; and to distinguish between their own and their parents choice of work.

Mrs. Helen Mandigo, home service director of the Gai Service company here, said "more and more jobs are opening up in business" for the home economics college graduate. Salaries start at $200 or $250 per month and range up to $1,000 or higher for experienced professionals, she said. One of the greatest demands now is for home economics teachers.

Other job opportunities were mentioned in the fields of product testing for food companies, research for manufacturing firms, textiles, dietetics and extension service.
