Butler Comforting Drive-Out-the-South Wing of Demo Party

Washington — (UP) — Democratic National Chairman Paul M. Butler is giving more comfort to the drive-out-the-South wing of his party than to the peacemakers who want to avoid another Dixie walk-out in 1960.

And Democrats in parts of the South, notably Georgia and Alabama, already this year have sharpened the tools to cut loose from the national party in 1960 if they feel they can not swallow the civil rights plank at the convention when they nominate their 1960 presidential candidate. In an interview this week, he visualized it is the most "positive and forthright" in the history of the party. He identified in the minds of Negro voters with the Southern Democratic party now symbolized by Faubus.

Southern primaries have shown mixed voting trends so far this year. Before Faubus' renominations, Texas Democrats renominated Sen. Ralph Yarborough, a moderate who voted for the civil rights bill last year. But they gave control of the party machinery to the conservative faction.

In the Alabama primary, Democratic loyalists lost control of the party machinery to conservatives who want to keep the door open for possible withdrawal from the national party in 1960.

The next big Southern test comes Thursday in the Tennessee primary, where Sen. Albert Gore, another moderate, who voted for the civil rights bill, is fighting for renomination. Democrats here view Gore as the favorite, but incumbents normally are favored unless a political upheaval is in the offing.
