Post Nasal Drip

Thousands of people are needlessly concerned over a dripping of mucus in the back of their throat. Many hawk and spit for an hour every morning, trying to get all of this stuff out. Some hawk until they vomit. A few hundred times when I have sent these people to a good nose expert he has reported that the person had no sinusitis; there was no pus in his nose, and all that could be seen was a little clear mucus.

I would then say to the patient: "Pay no attention to it; just swallow it; in a few minutes after it reaches your stomach, it will be digested and all gone, just as if it had been a little uncooked white of egg." But usually after we have chatted a while, the cat comes out of the bag, and the person has told me why he was so anxious about his post-nasal drip. To begin with, he was the sort of overly-worrisome person who insists that his body be always "just-so." Perhaps he takes, with each meal, a half-dozen pills of several kinds. The minute the slightest symptom appears, he runs to a doctor.

But the reason for his tremendous fear of the mucus in the back of his throat is his belief that it is poisonous, and that if he swallows it, it will go up and injure his brain. This, of course, is pure foolishness. Sometimes when I ask the man to explain further why he fears the mucus so much, he tells me his sister went insane, and he thinks this happened because she had a post-nasal drip and swallowed the mucus!

Obviously, such a patient needs a psychiatrist—not a nose specialist. There will be no let-up in his hawking and spitting until someone takes away from him his great fear of the perfectly harmless mucus.
