Reaching a Doctor in a Hurry

With the Emergency Call Plan

A few years ago, one night, a dozen cars piled up on the highway on the edge of a town, and many people lay bleeding and broken and badly banged up. The police started telephoning for doctors to come and help, but every time they reached a man he said,

"I never make calls, and if I were to go out there now I would be of no use to you because I am a stomach specialist (or a baby specialist, or a ear, nose and throat man, or the head of a research laboratory, or a psychiatrist, or an x-ray man)."

After several hours of this sort of thing, the police told something would have to be done to remedy the situation. Also, wise physicians began to see that those many persons who had gone through such a miserable experience trying to find a doctor at 2 a.m., had developed a grievance against the medical profession, and this was bad for everyone.

All over the land, medical associations began to leave with the local telephone exchange a list of names of men who would make night calls, and in some cities a special small exchange was set up to handle all emergency calls. Recently, I read in an article by Don Wharton that in Louisville, Ky., anyone who needs a doctor in a hurry merely dials a number, gives his name, address and telephone number and, in 10 minutes, a doctor calls him back, asks him for details and, if necessary, calls at the house. This emergency telephone number is well-publicized, and every Louisville hospital, police station, radio station and telephone operator has it. Twenty-five young doctors handle most of these emergency calls. Ohio City First

I read also that the medical society in Toledo, Ohio, was the first in the United States to establish such an emergency call system. Today, 710 such systems are in operation throughout this country. They reach 91 million people, or about half the population of the United States.

In a small farm community like Clinton county, Ohio, there is a rotating service with 12 physicians taking turns as the emergency doctor on duty. In Clark county, Ky., each week, one of the nine participating doctors becomes No. 1 Emergency Doctor, who doesn't leave the county all week; Emergency Doctor No. 2 doesn't leave without first seeing that a substitute is "covering" for him. In a big city like the Borough of Manhattan there is a panel of 235 doctors to handle the 8,000 emergency calls that come in each year.

The California Medical Association is now trying to work out a plan which will enable any resident of the state to dial a number and immediately be connected with get hold of some of that spoiled clover and extract the chemical that interferes with blood clotting. Such a chemical might well be just the one you want." Before my friend could get to work, another man announced the isolation of the drug, and my hunch proved to be correct. And that is how a substance in spoiled clover that was killing cattle came to be one of our most useful drugs!
