Boy Wonder of Fashions May Be Drafted by French

By ROBERT AHIER
United Press International

Paris — (UPI) — The future of the giant Dior fashion house may well be linked with Gen. Charles de Gaulle's efforts to end the four-year-old war in Algeria.

Officials of the fashion company admitted today that 22-year-old Yves Mathie Saint Laurent, the boy wonder who replaced the late Christian Dior, is in danger of being drafted.

"We won't want to face the idea that Saint Laurent might have to go as a draftee, and that for the second time in a year we would have to solve the problem of creating a brand new collection," a Dior official said.

Saint Laurent, a Frenchman born in Oran, Algeria, had a normal draft deferment as a student when his class was called up two years ago.

But now he is the top designer of the Dior concern.

"We just hope his draft deferment will not be cancelled," the official said, "and that he will be able to produce another fine spring show next February."

Saint Laurent now is in America. Dior announced a billion francs—$11,900,000 — business last year and is hoping to do better this year.

Saint Laurent is a shy, slim, dark haired young man, who wears glasses and blushes if you ask him a question.

A unique example in the history of fashion, he never really studied for the job.

He drew sketches for fun. They were shown to the late Christian Dior, who hired the boy as an assistant.

When Dior died last October, Saint Laurent took over and was a great success.

"Would Mr. Saint Laurent like to wear fatigues and go fighting the rebels in the Algerian mountains?" an official was asked.

"Of course Saint Laurent would do his duty as any Frenchman," the official said, "but maybe General De Gaulle will have ended the Algerian war before his time comes up."
