Pessimism Over Far East Situation Continues Higher in Soviet Circles

By HENRY SHAPIRO UPI Correspondent
Moscow—(UPI)—The dread that the dangerous game of "brinkmanship" might be carried one step too far in the current Far East crisis led today to a mood of pessimism in Moscow unparalleled since World War II.

In the opinion of diplomatic sources only a major back-down by the United States or the Soviet-Chinese partnership offered the slightest hope of a diplomatic solution to the problem of China's offshore islands.

There appeared no prospect of a major change in the Chinese stand, which the Soviet government was irrevocably pledged to support. As Moscowites saw it, that left the only chance of a peaceful solution in the hands of the Americans—and the Soviet and Chinese press told the people in headlines that the U.S. was growing more aggressive day by day.

The main reason for this view was the position Russia has adopted in relation to the Chinese bid to regain the offshore islands. The key points of this position included:—Premier Nikita Khrushchev's latest "message" to Washington committed Russia irrevocably to shooting it out if necessary in support of the Communist Chinese.

—Khrushchev, convinced that Russia has rocket superiority capable of eliminating all U.S. overseas bases in the event of a major war, has warned that he will retaliate with nuclear weapons if the U.S. uses them against the Chinese mainland. —Khrushchev has become "disenchanted" with President Eisenhower and has charged him with equal responsibility for the "brinkmanship" policy of Secretary of State John Foster Dulles. —In his August meeting with Chinese leader Mao Tse-tung, Khrushchev apparently pledged to throw the entire Soviet war machine into the battle if necessary in support of Red China's claims to the offshore islands.

The prospects of an all-out conflict in the Formosa area were made more menacing by the conviction in Moscow diplomatic circles that such a war could not be restricted to a localized conflict.

The way it looked from Moscow, both sides were geared for a major war which neither side wanted. The state of readiness was such that one false step taken in the belief that the other side was "bluffing" could send the whole situation plummeting over the brink.

The negotiations in Warsaw between the Chinese and U.S. ambassadors already were virtually written off as a failure by the Soviet and Chinese press.

Sightlessness Nothing To Be Ashamed of at Blind Center

Editor's Note: This is the third of three dispatches describing the V.A.'s Blind Rehabilitation Center by a reporter who spent several days there blindfolded.

By IRA LURVEY UPI Correspondent

Maywood, Ill.—(UPI)—They called him Smitty and he had just lost a smelly while doing his washing.

"Hey, if any of you guys see a blue sock in the washer, it's mine," he said. "Look under the cover," someone suggested. "Sometimes they get sucked up there."

"Got it," he said. "Cripes, Smitty," came the reply. "Somebody'd think you were blind."

He was. They all were. It was the way they operate at the Hines Veterans Administration Hospital's Blind Rehabilitation Center. Sightlessness is nothing to be ashamed of or hidden.

I "saw" the horseplay over the lost sock while I lived for three days—two with a blindfold over my eyes—with the men who are being taught a new way of life.

Not Embarrassed by Cane
"I'm not embarrassed about my cane any more," Cass Riggs of Hutchinson, Kan., said. "I realize now it's just an aid, like glasses."

Riggs, formerly an assistant sociology professor at the University of Wichita, plans to go for a Ph.D. in sociology at the University of Missouri.

To Bob Sheer of Miami, Fla., however, the Center's benefits are more complex. "Each man must find his own answer to blindness within himself," Sheer said.

Before World War II, Sheer was a garde de mach for the American Hotel Association. He was on special call throughout the Eastern seaboard, sculpturing ice and supervising table displays for top echelon banquets.

Today, blind, Sheer hopes to enroll at the University of Miami and eventually become an English teacher.

"It's a little late for a start, though," he said. "I'm past 40."

George Kearney of Norwood, Pa., used to read slide rules. The last thing he ever saw was a World War II European battlefield, where shrapnel tore out both his eyes.

Vital Point
"For a while, I washed gauges in a plant, but the recession closed that out. I haven't worked since," he said.

Riggs, Sheer and Kearney bring home a vital point about blindness.

"There's no cubbyhole of generalities into which society can shove blind people," Center psychologist Don Blasch said.

"Blind persons run the gamut of personality just like sighted persons. You've got all kinds, with all types of hopes and aspirations. Sure, you've got beggars. But you've got sighted beggars, too," he said.

Central Point Youths Cited by City Police
Central Point—Two Central Point boys were cited by Central Point city police Wednesday following a race on North fourth st., which resulted in one automobile turning over.

Cited for reckless driving were Robert Lee Parnell, 18, of route 2, box 198A, and Elmer Lesley Land, 17, of route 1, box 112, Central Point.

According to police the vehicle operated by Land turned over when their front right brake failed to hold.

Sheer said he expects nothing for nothing. "I know society's theme is 'You're not your brother's keeper,'" he said. "But does society have the right to take

Further Declines in Farm Prices Seen

Washington—(UPI)—An Agriculture Department report today forecast further declines in farm prices this fall, raising the prospect of lower prices for some foods.

With a record crop in prospect, a seasonal pickup in hog marketings and egg production running above a year ago, prices to farmers are likely to tend down in the next few months, department economists said.

Average prices received by farmers in mid-August were 2 percent above a year earlier but 5 percent below the 1958 high point reached in May.
