Problems of Small Home Solved By Senator's Wife

Washington—Twenty seconds from office to home. That will be about the "travel time" of Sen. Karl Mundt (R) S. D., when the new Senate Office Building is opened the first of the year. The Mundts live in one of the small, restored homes of Schott's court, separated only by an alley from the new building in which the senator expects to have his office.

Windows on one side of the office building overlook the court, once one of Washington's slums but now one of its gems. Two senators, a former senator and four members of the House of Representatives have taken seven of the 12 houses in, for them, the conveniently located court.

Since the houses are small, the problem of space is one their wives have had to conquer. Mrs. Mundt showed an

Navy Wants Midshipmen To Be Practically Perfect

By PATRICIA McCORMACK New York—(UPI)—If a gal's heart skips a beat when a Navy midshipman walks by, it's not only the uniform. It's also the fellow wearing it. By Navy rules he's got to be at least passably good looking.

"Extreme ugliness," according to an official 7,000-word treatise on physical requirements for midshipmen, is a "disqualifying defect."

It is among hundreds of disqualifying physical defects spelled out in a booklet the Navy is passing out to young men who might like to try for one of the 1,800 midshipman appointments effective next fall.

Physical requirements, as stated, "are inflexible and the slightest deviation will be cause for rejection."

Rigid Physical Before the candidate can take the rigid physical, he must sail through a college aptitude test. Almost 30 percent who passed the mental test in recent years have subsequently been rejected for physical defects.

"Extreme ugliness" is listed under Sub-Section One, Section J, in a 10-page appendix in the Navy's informational booklet.

Apparently it is up to the doctor to arrive at the judgment on his own, for the defect isn't defined: "Boys with knock-knees are flunked if the condition 'makes their gait clumsy or ungainly.' Of bow-legs, the Navy says:

"A cause for rejection if so marked as to produce noticeable deformity when the applicant is dressed."

Ingrown toe-nails, boat-like feet, unsightly spaces between the teeth and obscene, offensive or indecent tattooing are other "disqualifying" defects that can sink a candidate. Must Be Single To remain physically perfect during the four-year training course, candidates who are accepted must promise to avoid marriage.

The perfectly perfect specimens who are picked get the title of midshipman in the regular Navy reserve officers training corps. They are assigned to a college and the Navy pays tuition, other fees and a retainer of $50 a month.

The midshipman is free to major in a field of his choice—unless that field happens to be dramatics, hotel administration, theology, real estate and a few other specialties the Navy doesn't consider seaworthy.
