Prejudice Said To Exist Toward Employment of Physically Handicapped

Editor's note: The following was written by John W. Sanders, coordinator of selective placement for the physically handicapped at the Camp White Veterans, Domiciliary and a member of the Jackson county committee for employment of the physically handicapped.

In these days when everyone is talking about racial prejudice, we might turn our thoughts to another type of prejudice which exists in many American cities. It is the prejudice against the physically handicapped who are seeking jobs.

These men and women are not asking that special concessions be made for them; they are only asking that they be allowed the right to earn a living for themselves and their families. They want to work side by side with others, bound by the same rules, regulations and schedules of pay and working hours.

One Out of Six
Who are these handicapped people? Statistically they are one out of ever six Americans, or about 30,000,000 people.

Pamela Freeman, and the Straus's daughters, Jackie, Janice, and Kimbra.

Actually, they are your neighbors and mine—the man who lost both legs in the war, the young fellow who lost the use of an arm to the ravages of polio, the woman who walks by your house each day led by her seeing-eye dog and who sees the world through her sensitive finger tips.

I do not mean to imply that employers are hard-hearted monsters. The curtain of fear often prevents them from hiring these people. They fear that their workman's compensation rates may be raised, or that these people cannot produce a day's work equivalent to a non-handicapped person, or that the person's physical imperfection may be repugnant to the sensibilities of his fellow-worker or to the public.

Potential employees need to have these myths laid. We hope that we shall be able to thrust aside this veil of prejudices and help the handicapped to gain his rightful place in the busy world where he must seek employment.
