Age 7 to 14

HOLDING HIGH PLACES in speculation concerning successor to Pope Pius XII, who suffered cerebral stroke, are these Roman Catholic Church leaders, according to Vatican reports. From left: Gregoire Pierre Cardinal Agagianian, 63, of Armenia; Eugene Cardinal Tisserant, 74, of France, and Archbishop Giovanni Battista Montini, 59, of Milan.

Five Cardinals, One Prelate In Line as Successor To Pope

Vatican City—(UPI)—Five Italian cardinals and a Russian-born Armenian prelate headed the list today of possible successors to Pope Pius XII. The new leader of the world's 450 million Roman Catholics will be chosen by the 55 members of the Sacred College of Cardinals. There was a possibility that the new Pope would be the first non-Italian chosen in 435 years. Non-Italians are in a majority in the college for the first time in centuries—37 to 18.

However, most observers predicted the cardinals would follow modern tradition and elect an Italian as the 263rd pope.

The chances of Francis Cardinal Spellman of New York and the other American cardinals of an ascending throne of St. Peter were considered rather slim for political rather than personal reasons. Widespread feeling was that the election of an American pope would give the impression that the Catholic church was becoming involved in the political struggle between the East and West.

Technically, any Catholic, either layman or priest, could be chosen pope, but it has been an unwritten law since the days of Sixtus IV in the 15th Century that only cardinals are chosen.

Among the most likely candidates are Giacomo Cardinal Lecaro, archbishop of Bologna; Giuseppe Cardinal Siri of Genoa; Ernesto Cardinal Ruffini, archbishop of Palermo, Sicily; Angelo Giuseppe Cardinal Roncalli of Venice; Valerio Cardinal Valeri, a famed Vatican theologian; and Gregory Peter XV Agagianian, Russian-born patriarch of Cilicia of the Armenians. Also mentioned is Msgr. Giovanni Battista Montini, archbishop of Milan, the only one of the "papabili" (potential popes) who is not a cardinal.

Pope Started Law Education; Turned To Church at 18

Editor's note: Pius XII was the first "modern" pope—first to fly, first to use a typewriter. His travels took him over Europe, where in Germany he encountered Bolshevism face to face in 1919, and to North and South America. The following is the first of two dispatches on the personality and career of one of the most brilliant and human men of his time.

Vatican City—(UPI)—When Eugenio Pacelli was five years old he listened to an uncle, a missionary priest, who told him of the dangers of church work in the jungles of Brazil and of the martyrdom some missionaries had suffered.

"I too, want to be a martyr," the boy said. "But without nails."

In a sense, he did suffer martyrdom. His later years were saddened by two world wars. He became Pope Pius XII only six months before the start of World War II.

The son of a patrician family, Eugenio Pacelli was a frail boy with melancholy eyes, his hair but in a bang across his forehead. Though frail, he had an intrepid spirit, and he was athletic. He never lost his boyhood love of sports.

He was the first "modern" pope. He was the first pope to fly—he made his first airplane flight in Germany in 1927—and the first to use a typewriter. He was the first to popularize radio speeches, he was keen on television experimenting.

A Noble Family

He was born March 2, 1876, within sight of the Vatican, third child of Filippo Pacelli. The family emblem is a dove of peace and the family name has been rendered as "pax caeli"—peace from heaven.

The boy's early education had been pointed toward the law, but at 18 he decided to enter the priesthood. He went to the Capanna College in Rome to begin his ecclesiastical studies.

He used to study sometimes until 1 or 2 a.m. Then, up early, he would take a cold bath, do setting up exercises in his room, drink a small cup of coffee, and start the day anew.

He was ordained to the priesthood April 2, 1899.

He took post-graduate courses at the university, specializing in civil and canon law. He was made a substitute professor of law and later titular professor of law and professor of diplomacy.

While he was substitute professor, he won the notice of the Vatican and was made an apprentice in the secretariat. His first job was to make copies of office documents.

Magnetic Personality

The studious boy had grown into a gentle, keen, modest man, untiring in his work, with a personality that was to endear him all his life to those who knew him.

The brilliance of the young priest was soon recognized. With the approval of Pope Pius X, he was persuaded to resign his professorship and give himself entirely to his Vatican work.

His rise in the Vatican secretariat was rapid. He made himself master of Latin, Greek, French, English, Spanish, German, Portuguese, Hungarian and Slovak in addition to his own Italian.

A papal nuncio wrote of him: "Pay attention to him, because we will see him on the throne of St. Peter."

In 1917, Pope Benedict XV made him papal nuncio to Bavaria in Germany. At that time the Munich nunciature was the channel for all negotiations between Germany and the Vatican.

Pope Benedict had decided to make a supreme attempt to stop the war. The new nuncio went to see Kaiser Wilhelm II to present a papal appeal for peace. He got nowhere, but the Kaiser wrote in his diary: "Pacelli is a distinguished, understanding, most intelligent person and of perfect manner. An ideal prince, in sum, of the Catholic church."

Threatened By Reds

At the war's end the workers of Bavaria declared a Bolshevik republic. Government and diplomats fled Munich. The nuncios stayed. One evening seven Reds arrived to requisition a nuncio's available motor cars. The nuncio faced them, with their pistols and raised knives menacing him. They left. Next day the Reds trained machine guns on the building. German troops arrived later and took over. Nuncio Pacelli wrote to friends:

"I have seen weeks of the terror of the Bolshevik dictatorship and the civil war. I was menaced with revolvers and grenades."

After the war the papal nunciature of Berlin was established, and the future pope was made nuncio. He negotiated concordats—treaties—with Bavaria and Germany.

So popular did he make himself in Berlin that when he left for home on a cold December night in 1929, to become secretary of state and a cardinal, Berliners lined the streets to see him off.

As secretary of state Cardinal Pacelli traveled widely. He visited South America and, in 1936, the United States.

In the United States, where he was called the flying Cardinal, he disclosed that many years before he had been offered the professorship of law in the Catholic University in Washington, D. C.

"Only the paternal refusal of the Holy Father Pius X prevented Washington from becoming my second home," he said.

Coos Bay Area Bus Fare Hearings Slated

Salem—(UPI)—Application of Gorst and King, Inc., for authority to raise bus fares in the Coos Bay area about 10 per cent will be heard Oct. 22 at North Bend, Public Utility Commissioner Howard Morgan said today.

The company declared the higher rates are necessary to meet increased operating costs.
