Mayhem in Movieland

Mayhem starts with mild difference of opinion.

Hollywood actors may not be much when it comes to night-club fights, but before a camera they're brutal!

Now it's Murray's turn, and Egan is sent spinning along bar and through front door into street.

Lee Remick, who caused it all, has last word.

Egan rises to wrath with roundhouse right to Don's jaw. Locked in mortal combat, as they say, pair pulverizes furniture.

Rolling in mud, gruesome twosome grind up the goo. Ah, the dastardly coward! Egan draws gun and levels at Don.

by Peer J. Oppenheimer

BACK IN 1914, William Farnum and Tom Santschi battled through one full reel in what is still considered the classic movie fight of all time. Ever since, fist fights have been an integral part of motion pictures, with actors constantly trying to surpass their predecessors in reality and brutality. Latest entry in this category is the fight between Don Murray and Richard Egan in 20th-Century Fox's "These Thousand Hills" which producer David Weisbart claims will go down in Hollywood history as the roughest fight ever!

The rumpus starts in Miss Fran's palace of pleasure after Dick has been knocking Lee Remick around, and Don does not approve. He refuses to drink with Dick and, instead, tosses a glass of whiskey in his face. In what may be described as a well-coordinated movement, Egan rises, sweeps the card table aside, and plants a haymaker on Murray's jaw. They crash against a table and to the floor. Next they rise against the bar; it is Murray's turn to swat Egan. They leave the bar in a shambles and fight up the stairs and through the bannisters, much to Miss Fran's consternation. As Dick is about to deliver a coup de grace with his boot, our hero once more charges the villainous Egan. This time they knock out the portals of the palace and shatter the guardrail to the street. Outside it has been raining and the combat becomes really dirty. The muddy mayhem waxes murderous when Egan seizes a carbine from a saddle sheath and aims it at Murray. Before he can fire, a shot is heard and Egan goes down. Lee Remick's black eye did not interfere with her deadly aim! The fight lasts four minutes on the screen and took two days to film. It cost $60,000 and numerous bottles of ketchup.
