

Back Stairs: Ike Wants Fried Eggs

By MERRIMAN SMITH
UPI Correspondent
Washington - (UPI) - Back stairs at the White House: What would President Eisenhower like to have for his 68th birthday Tuesday? Not what you'd think. He doesn't need golf clubs, automobiles, wrist watches or fishing tackle. But he certainly could do with some fried eggs or possibly a Boston cream pie.

Alas, these simple gifts for a man who has two of everything, are as far beyond his reach as a new Thunderbird for the average teenager.

From all outward indications, the President has well recovered from his 1955 heart attack, but he is reminded of that frightening period every time he sits down to a meal.

To keep his weight down, fried and rich foods are completely out. His doctor, Maj. Gen. Howard McC. Snyder doesn't mind if his famous patient goes on an occasional dietary "binge."

Snyder, however, knows as does any physician, that most patients who must stay away from certain types of food are generally happier if they stay completely away, and "cheat" on their diets occasionally by eating larger amounts of accepted foods.

W. Alton Jones, New York, and the portly head of Cities Service, is one of the President's close friends and frequent companions. During the past week end with the chief executive at Camp David in the Maryland mountains, Jones played so many long hours of bridge that he developed what seemed to be the symptoms of a real back ailment.

He confided at the Gettysburg Country Club that because of the circumstances, he could hardly blame his pain on the long afternoon and evening sessions at the card table. This could be the dilemma of any presidential guest. One simply does not quit any form of joint activity with a President until the chief executive, himself, calls it quits. This goes for leaving the table, leaving a room or leaving a party.

And the next day on the golf course, Jones worked out his back soreness, but faced still another hazard.

"And now," he said as he left the Gettysburg course with the President's party, "I'll have the pleasure of hearing George Allen complain about his golf game all the way back to Camp David."

Whether the President is playing golf in Gettysburg or Palm Springs, any key member of the White House staff—and presumably the Cabinet—can pick up a telephone and determine Eisenhower's exact position; whether he's putting, teeing off and rolling down the fairway in his blue electric cart.

This is possible because the Secret Service and the Signal Corps report by shortwave radio every few minutes on the President's location. This information goes to one central point where there's always an agent or officer stationed by a telephone cut directly into the White House switchboard.

Thus the President theoretically could be reached at any moment, but in practicality, he is rarely disturbed on the golf course unless there has been a world-shaking development of which he must be informed instantly.

Quotes From the News

By UNITED PRESS INTERNATIONAL

New York—President Eisenhower, on the bombing of a Jewish synagogue in Atlanta:

"I think we would all share in the feeling of horror that any person would want to desecrate the holy place of any religion, be it a chapel, a cathedral, a mosque, a church or a synagogue."

Belgrade—Yugoslavian President Tito, on attacks on his country by other Communist regimes:

"We are called traitors and hirelings because we accept (Western) foreign aid at a time when our country was in an economic plight, when famine was at our door."

Hampton, Va.—Thurgood Marshall, general counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, on anti-integration moves by Southerners:

"The South is just buying time. It is buying time on too expensive terms, by destroying public education, by using the taxpayers' money to fight a battle that they know it will lose."

Taipei, Formosa—Peiping radio, in an attack against the United States and its Nationalist Chinese allies:

"There can be no escape for them, even if they take to hiding in the moon. Where the enemy can go, we can go—and drag them back."

The Family Council

Editor's note: The Family Council consists of a judge, a psychiatrist, three clergymen, a newspaper editor, a women's editor and two writers. Each article is a summary of an actual report. The Family Council does not give advice; it merely reports on problems that have been dealt with by responsible agencies and counselors.

Felice R.—His children are bleeding him.

Cyrus R.—I am trying to make up to them.

Felice R.—I have been married for the past three years to a man who was separated from his wife when I met him. He has two children, a boy of 12 and a girl of 14, by this first marriage.

My husband provides these children with a very generous allowance, according to the terms set by the court. In addition, he gives them lovely and expensive presents for birthdays, Christmas and other occasions.

On top of this, the kids constantly ask for small handouts for various little notions of theirs—new parts for a camera, a week end trip, a senseless gadget. Their letters are filled with love and affection and my husband never turns them down. I feel they are bleeding him and making a sap out of him. All the time we have to do without any of the comforts that other people in our income bracket have.

Cyrus R.—When I met Felice I told her immediately what my situation was. I never deceived her about what she could expect as my wife. My income is far from glittering—and I have two young kids to bring up and educate as well as possible.

I told Felice my kids are the most important things in the world to me and I want to make up for the damage my former wife and I have done them through our incompatibility. I feel that they are starting life with two strikes against them. The least I can do is give them every possible advantage I can afford.

Another problem is the fact that my former wife wants to live near her folks in a community quite far from where my business is located. I can't see the kids very often and I want them to know their dad cares about them even though he can't be around every day.

The Council: Cyrus' feelings are natural and understandable but we doubt whether he is going to achieve his ends if he pursues the present line.

Fathers in Cyrus' position are often forced to use money and gifts as a substitute for attention. They should try to avoid this as much as possible. The children know they are lacking a father's day-to-day care and interest and are inclined to use this fact as a weapon to extort money. It's not a pretty picture for either the father or the children.

If Cyrus is doing his duty in providing for the children and shows his thoughtfulness of them in modest birthday and Christmas gifts, there should be no need for the "handouts" Felice refers to. We would do far better to write to them more often and try to arrange frequent visits. He must show them the contact with them is more important than anything else.

Cyrus would do well to curb himself in the matter of bestowing money, but Felice would also do well to step out of this area. She places herself in a very unpleasant position of rivalry with the children for Cyrus' money. Her role should be a more gracious one in relation to these children.
