

Nixon, Kefauver Ready to Keep Foreign Policy in '58 Campaign

By RAYMOND LAHR
 United Press International
 Washington (UPI)—The rival candidates for vice president in 1956 made it clear today that they are ready to keep foreign policy in the 1958 campaign debate even though President Eisenhower deplores the whole idea.

This was the position taken by both Vice President Richard M. Nixon and Sen. Estes Kefauver, 1956 Democratic vice presidential nominee, with reference to campaign debate on Far Eastern policy. Kefauver told a reporter that the country must unite behind the President whenever an irrevocable decision is made. But meanwhile, he said, it is "fair to discuss and debate foreign policy."

Nixon told a San Francisco news conference Wednesday that he intends to continue answering Democratic attacks on administration policies although it was proper for the President of the United States to refrain from doing so.

"One of the troubles of the Republican party in the past two years is that it has allowed people to criticize and has not stood up and answered effectively," Nixon said. "I expect our opponents to attack our policies, but when I answer I don't expect to have people say that the attack is justified but the answer is unfair."

These viewpoints were expressed after Eisenhower and Secretary of State John Foster Dulles had suggested at news conferences this week that foreign policy be kept out of partisan debate in the campaign.

Dulles at first appeared to be criticizing Nixon. But he issued a statement Wednesday blaming a week end statement from the Democratic Advisory Council for stirring up the debate. He also explicitly defended Nixon's right to answer that statement as the vice president did Monday.

Eisenhower told his news conference Wednesday that he thought foreign policy should be kept out of partisan debate and that he would not answer charges against him. He said he recognized that statements beget replies but that he deplored the fact.

"So I believe in the long term America's best interest in the world will be best served if we do not indulge in this kind of thing," he added. Kefauver, a member of the Democratic Advisory Council, said both Eisenhower and Dulles had "vacillated" in their attitude toward the disputed Quemoy and Matsu islands of the Chinese mainland. While they were acting in that fashion, he said, the status of the islands was "a legitimate subject to discuss."

Just back from a campaign tour in California, Kefauver said he had been expressing hope that the Quemoy and Matsu dispute could be settled by negotiations and that, if these failed, the problem would be submitted to the United Nations.

The Tennessee Democrat also said he thought the Far Eastern crisis and "general foreign policy problems" had added to Democratic party strength in the 1958 campaign.

However, he expressed the belief that economic issues were the most important from the viewpoint of the voters.
