Let's talk about the little things.
The Air Force sent its Pioneer moon rocket off into the wide blue yonder - sparkling blue for a while and then becoming the dead black of outer space - at a speed of 34,400 feet per second. A top American scientist - Dr. I. M. Levitt, of Philadelphia - says that to reach its goal it should have started off 850 feet per second faster.
It is also deduced that the Pioneer was shot off at too steep an angle, thus slowing its speed and using more fuel - like starting your car off up too steep a hill.

THOSE are LITTLE things. But little things are often SO important.
Like the apple that fell off the tree and hit Sir Isaac Newton on the head, suggesting to him the law (now known as the law of gravity) that all particles of matter in the universe exert an attraction on one another.
That law is now IMMENSELY important because it has so much to do with the success or failure of outer space travel.

THAT brings up another little thing - a little blower in announcing the achievement of our moon rocket. It was erroneously asserted that it sped BEYOND the pull of earth's gravity.
That isn't true. The moon itself is within the pull of earth's gravity. It circles around the earth because at the point of its orbit the pull of gravity is exactly balanced by the push of centrifugal force.
You can illustrate that for yourself by fastening a ball to a string and whirling the ball around your head. The string has the same effect as the earth's gravity pull. It is centrifugal force that pushes the ball outward and keeps the string tight.

BUT let's get away from moon rockets and outer space travel.

On upper crust Esher Park avenue in London lives a citizen named John Luttmore. He owns a minah bird. Next door to him lives another citizen named Clifford Blackmore.

Citizen Blackmore haled Citizen Luttmore into court on a charge that Luttmore's minah bird is a raucous character that wolf-whistles girls and sings like a drunken sailor. When the bird gets tired of wolf whistling and drunken singing, Blackmore alleges, it goes into a startling imitation of suddenly screeching car brakes, throwing everybody within hearing into a tizzy.

He complains that he can hear the bird over his garden hedge from dawn till dusk. On summer evenings he has trouble getting the children to sleep and finds it unbearable to sit out in his garden. He terms the minah bird a nuisance and demands that the nuisance be abated.

A LITTLE thing? Sure it is.
But if the ruckus over the minah bird gets bitter and still more bitter - as ruckuses like that can do - the joy of living on London's Esher Park avenue will be destroyed.
Destruction of the joy of living is a BIG THING in this world.
