Is That So?

By OLGA BURNS

Most of us think of pig or boar hunting as a foreign sport, but the fact is it has been going on in America for centuries.

Strangely enough, however, with the exception of the peccary in the Southwest, there are only two places in the country I can find where the pig has been elevated to the status of a game animal. One is Monterey county, Calif. The other is the Cherokee National Forest, in Tennessee.

The reason for this distinction, made only during the past decade or so, is not due to a sudden official recognition of the game qualities of the long established razorback. Instead, it is intended to protect the descendants of recently imported Prussian wild boar.

Discrimination

That, it seems to me, is a case of discrimination that should be adjusted by raising our own wild pigs to the same level. They, too, are of European descent with an ancestry fully as distinguished though not so well recorded. In addition, they are unquestionably of the most redoubtable pioneed stock.

The razorbacks of the Mississippi river bottoms and other parts of the South are, many of them, descendants of the 13 pigs which Hernando De Soto brought with him to Florida in 1539. The history of the expedition proves it conclusively.

As for those found farther north, they are descended from those brought over by the Cavaliers to Virginia or the Puritans to Massachusetts. In both cases the pigs multiplied so fast that within 20 years they alone among all livestock brought over were listed as simply "innumerable." Not only that but the English soon passed laws forbidding Indians to earmark their hogs. Otherwise the whites could not tell whether a pig offered for sale by an Indian had been stolen.

Chief Protection

This earmarking of pigs, by the way, is the chief protection of a pig has today in California, outside of Monterey county.

Since the days of the Spaniards, pigs have been running wild in the Sierra. Many ranchers today earmark their pigs and turn them loose in the hills. If a man shoots an earmarked pig, he damages the owner.
