School Support Formula Claimed Hard To Figure

The state board of education, of which Mrs. Eve Hamilton, Medford, is a member, will meet next week in Salem to consider recommendations of committees on technical and vocational education. The Flescher report on Oregon Technical Institute, Klamath Falls, also will be considered.

According to present recommendations, technical training would be removed from Oregon State college, Corvallis, and area vocational centers would be established, Mayfield explained.

The current proposal, he said, is to maintain the system of public schools of grades 1 through 12 as the basis of education. Graduates from the public school system would either enter technical institutions and colleges or vocational schools. Students, however, would not be restricted to one particular category.

If the student found he could qualify for college or technical training, he could shift to vocational training if college or technical training proves too difficult, Mayfield explained.

Proposed Pattern
Under the proposed pattern of Oregon public education, vocational school and junior college type programs would have from one to three years attendance. A certificate but no degree would be given on completion of work. The technical institute and collegiate type programs would have from two to seven years attendance. A diploma plus a degree would be given upon completion of the course.

The current proposal would divide the state into seven districts for vocational education centers. In southern Oregon Curry, Coos, Douglas, Jackson and Josephine counties would form District 4 with a total assessed valuation of $273,082,059 and an estimated population of 242,650, Mayfield said.

Financing Told
Such education centers would be financed by some state money, some federal money, student tuition and some local money, he explained.

John Niedermeyer, Jacksonville, objected to this, saying the local school districts citizens are taxed enough already and could not afford to support additional institutions.

Mayfield said the need for the study arose when it was realized by educators that technical and vocational training is needed beyond that given in high school and not at the high level of requirements set by college.

New officers elected last night to Oregon School Boards Association, District 13, are Glen Smith, Rufin, chairman; Mrs. Herman Renfro, Grants Pass, vice chairman; and Mrs. Jeannette Groves, secretary.

Small Mouse With Big Appetite Poses Problem

Corvallis—A small mouse with an enormous appetite for tree seed poses a serious problem in natural or artificial re-seeding of forest lands in Oregon, a study made by an Oregon State college forestry graduate shows.

The white-footed deer mouse destroys more coniferous tree seed than any rodent, it was found. Two mice per acre can consume in five weeks the one-half pound of seed usually sown in artificial seeding. The population per acre runs from two to eight.

Research on the mouse was conducted on Tillamook Burn plots by Edward F. Hooven for his master's degree in forest management. Hooven is research mammalogist with the state-operated Oregon Forest Lands Research center, Corvallis.

His study
