A Poor Nervous Inheritance

When I say in this column that able psychiatrists such as Professor Franz Kallmann of Columbia University have proved up to the hilt that by far the commonest cause of insanity is an inherited tendency, a few people protest, while many others say, "How right you are, as I have every reason to know—because my family is full of people with either definite mental trouble or else alcoholism, eccentricity, poor adjustment, an inability ever to work, an inability to get along with people, or hypochondriasis, a bunch of nerves."

A fine, well-educated woman writes me from Australia to say that she is much interested in this problem because of the tragedy in her life. As a girl she heard whispers about an uncle who was an alcoholic, but, naturally, it did not occur to her that this relative's tendency to drink could affect her future in any way. Years later when she married, and a mentally abnormal child was born to her, she did what so many of us do when a tragedy like this comes to us, she went to her eldest relatives to learn something about her nervous inheritance. Then she learned that her parents had done what so many do, and had kept the closet door closely shut on the family skeletons. Her mother admitted that her brother (the alcoholic) had at times been criminally insane—a schizophrenic who had spent time in a mental hospital and had barely escaped spending time in a penitentiary.

All Suffering

This uncle had nine brothers and sister, all intelligent, but all suffering from nervous troubles. Their mother in her chances they have of having normal and abnormal children.

As the woman said, "Do please keep on writing about this tremendously important subject of heredity. No matter how many angry letters you get from people who don't want to hear a word about this matter, keep writing to help those many thousands of mothers like me who want to know the facts, even if these facts tear at our hearts. Give us all the hope you can, but do not lie to us. That won't help us."

So I plan to quote in this column from wonderful letters which I am getting from persons who tell me that in spite of the fact that they inherited a marked tendency to insanity—a tendency that has distressed them for most of their life—in their fifties they are still working at responsible jobs; they have married and kept the love of their spouses, and they feel they have succeeded in life. The person who gets a bad nervous inheritance can often fight it to a standstill; he does not have to lie down and whine and quit.
