

Federal Highway Sign Regulations Are Announced

Washington—(AP)—The government has published regulations designed to control billboards along the 41,000-mile interstate highway system.

The standards were released by Commerce Department Secretary Sinclair Weeks, who hailed them as "a big step in preserving the beauty of our country's scenic assets."

The controls are not mandatory. But states adopting the enforcing of them will collect a bonus of one-half of one per cent in federal funds, in addition to the 90 per cent the federal government is contributing for the entire $37 billion highway system.

Four Types of Signs
The department noted the legislation permits four types of signs along the multi-lane, limited access highway network:

—Directional or other official signs required or authorized by law. These would include distance markers, postings of speed limits, etc.

—Signs advertising the sale or lease of the property upon which they are located.

—Signs advertising activities conducted within 12 miles of the point at which the sign is located. This would include hotels, restaurants and stores within specified distance.

—Signs designed to give information in the specific interest of the traveling public.
