

Good Marriages-- Basis of Good Community, DA Says

Good marriages are the basis of a good community and Christian faith is the best foundation for successful marriages, District Attorney Thomas J. Reeder said Wednesday morning at the monthly meeting of the Medford Ministerial association.

Speaking on "The Ministry and the Attorney Look at Divorce," the district attorney commented on what the minister can do to help prevent the increasing number of divorces. He said that the sanctity of marriage is derived from our Christian heritage.

Commenting on how the church can help stem the divorce rate, Reeder mentioned the use of young married couples within the church, premarriage instructions for better understanding and the importance of the minister being available for counseling.

He also mentioned that talks by the pastor could develop "teenagers" character quality in preparation for marriage. He added that Sunday schools are a very important tool in child development.

The attorney stressed that the consequences of a bad marriage are one of the social evils, and mentioned that anything that could be done to lower the divorce rate would be worthwhile.

Causes of divorce stated by the attorney were incompatibility, immaturity, economic difficulties, sex ignorances, and drinking.

During the business meeting that followed the program the association voted to postpone any action regarding the establishment of a local group of Oregonians United for Separation of Church and State.

The ministers approved a motion to continue action on the matter pending the appearance of Edward Terry, state chairman of the organization.

Churches Attempt to Restore Meaning to Public Worship

By LOUIS CASSELLS United Press International As most church-goers must have noticed by now, something is happening to religious services in America.

Clergymen call it "the liturgical revival." Translated from the Greek, this simply means that churches are trying to restore meaning and vitality to public worship.

The specific reforms vary considerably from one denomination to another. But they fall into two general categories.

1. Churches that have fixed forms of worship—the Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, Lutherans and Presbyterians, for example — are putting new emphasis on the role of the congregation. They are seeking to make the man in the pew an active participant, rather than a passive spectator, in worship.

2. Evangelical Protestant bodies, in which each minister is free to choose his own order of service, are moving toward greater formality and dignity. They are gradually introducing robes for the choir and sometimes the minister; organ preludes to create a mood of reverence and eliminate preservice congregational chatter; and the occasional use of "pre-mediated" written prayers instead of the customary extemporaneous prayer.

Expanded Participation A recent example in the first category was a directive issued by the Vatican last month prescribing an expanded role for Roman Catholic laity in the celebration of the mass. It calls for a number of congregational responses during low and sung masses, including joint recitation of the Lord's Prayer. It also provides for a narrator to read scriptural passages to the congregation in English while the priest is reciting them in Latin.

A striking example of the trend in evangelical bodies is the increasingly common practice in Baptist churches of devoting an entire service to the observance of the Lord's Supper. The sermon—traditionally the main feature of Baptist worship — is often omitted entirely at this service.

One common theme runs through all of the varied manifestations of the liturgical revival. It is the conviction that worshipping God is an end in itself, not a means to an end. For some modern Christians, this is more radical doctrine than it may sound. The idea has grown up in recent generations that the main reason for attending church is that the worshipper gets some kind of spiritual benefit. The expected benefit may be a reverent feeling, a higher ethical resolve, a deeper faith, or "strength" to face the week ahead.

Purpose Is Worship Leaders of the liturgical movement agree that all of these benefits may be found at church. But they say it is basically wrong to think of church attendance in self-centered terms of "what I get out of it." The first and indispensable purpose of going to church is render to God, as his due, the tribute called worship.

And what does worship mean? One classic definition is that of the late William Temple, archbishop of Canterbury: "To worship is to quicken the conscience by the holiness of God, to feed the mind with the truth of God, to purge the imagination by the beauty of God, to open up the heart to the love of God, to devote the will to the purpose of God."

An old catechism expresses the same thought in fewer words: "Worship is man's acknowledgment of the supreme value of God."
