Search Continues For 15 Crewmen Of Ill-Fated Ship

Charlevoix, Mich. —UPI— Coast Guardsmen held virtually no hope today for the 15 crewmen of the ill-fated Great Lakes cargo ship Carl D. Bradley still missing in the storm-tossed waters of Lake Michigan that smashed and swallowed the craft. A Coast Guard spokesman said search efforts would "continue all day" today but veteran seamen said there was little chance anyone could have survived in the icy waters since the disaster Tuesday. Of the 35 men aboard the limestone hauler, only two survived. Eighteen bodies have been found so far and 15 still are missing. "We prayed like we never prayed before," said first mate Elmer Fleming and deck watchman Frank Mays, both of Rogers City, Mich., who were saved Wednesday. "It was useless for us to shout because of the tremendous roar of the gale," Mays said. He told reporters that at one time during the 14-hour nightmare he and Fleming were within half a mile of the rescue ship Sundew, but the 60 mile an hour winds and 20 foot waves made communication impossible. Sundew Spots Them After the pair repeatedly were washed from their frail life raft and their frozen fingers were barely able to cling to it, the Sundew spotted them. Rescue men pulled them from the small raft and took them to Charlevoix along with eight corpses. Fleming's description of the sinking and night at sea paralleled terrifying accounts of 14 survivors told May 11, 1953, when the Henry Steinbrenner, an oil carrier, foundered in the lake with a loss of 17 lives. "The entire stern of the ship was sagging," Fleming said. "I knew we were going to sink. I asked someone to get me a life jacket but he couldn't find one so I went to my room and got my own. "As I came up the ship was listing badly. "The superstructure of the ship rolled over on its side. The ship sank beneath me and I found myself in the water," he said. Temperatures dipped below freezing during the seemingly endless night and ice formed in 43-year-old Fleming's hair. Fleming and Mays, 26, heard shouting and managed to direct two men to their wave-tossed raft. They grabbed the men's limbs and pulled them aboard only to have both of them washed away to watery graves while Fleming and Mays clung tenaciously to the tiny raft. "I've never been so cold in my life," Fleming said. They were taken to Charlevoix Hospital where their tearful wives embraced them. Dr. Lawrence E. Grate, who examined Fleming and Mays, said they were in fairly good condition despite exposure and shock. "It's an amazing piece of human endurance," Grate said.
