Love Is Like This

by Aline Thompson

"O.KAY," Linda Bartine said to her husband and hung up the phone. She looked at the small table cozily set for two and muttered "Darn it, anyway!"

With a quick glance at the clock, she put in extra leaves and reset the table for four. Then she went into the tiny, still-new kitchen, peeled more potatoes, rolled out more biscuit dough, and tossed more endive into the salad.

Tonight was the third time this week that Steve had brought guests home. It was just too much: married only three months and she had fewer evenings alone with him than when they were engaged!

Just thinking about it made Linda blink to keep back the tears. But when Steve came in the door an hour later, bringing Bill and Jonesy, she had tied her dark pony tail with a hyacinth-blue ribbon and put an amusing wisp of apron around her slender waist.

She wanted to cling to Steve when he kissed her, but there were Bill and Jonesy, smiling their delight at being asked to dinner.

"Smells wonderful," Bill said, sniffing at the door of the kitchen.

"Bet we're having meat balls again," Jonesy said, happily.

It wasn't as if Bill and Jonesy were important to Steve's career, Linda thought when they were at the table and Steve was being the expansive host.
