Family Council

BARBARA A. - I tried to patch things up. ALLEN A. - I could have told her she'd make things worse.

BARBARA A. - I am in the middle of a conflict involving my husband and his brother and sister-in-law. The sister-in-law has done many things to separate the two brothers who were very close as children. She said things against my husband and me to friends and relatives. She did not invite us to her new home, yet complained when she wasn't asked to one of our parties. The other day my brother-in-law called me and asked me to meet him to discuss ways of patching things up. I met him at a restaurant and he made terrible accusations against me and my husband, saying we did various things to hurt him. These things are all lies and we got into a battle royal. Now my husband accuses me of having made things worse.

ALLEN A. - I feel that Barbara never should have made an appointment with my brother without consulting me. I could have told her that it would only make matters worse. I feel that my brother is not a very strong person and he is completely dominated by Margaret, who is a vicious conniving woman. She has convinced him that we outdid him of a portion of our parents' estate. My brother knows in his heart that I never would do a thing like that and the fact that he could say it makes me feel that a reconciliation is impossible. I once had hopes that things would somehow straighten themselves out, but since these things were said, I feel we should insist on an apology-which we won't get.

THE COUNCIL: "Patching up" sessions, unless conducted by the parties immediately concerned often become free-for-all brawls. We agree with Allen that Barbara should not have gotten involved in this controversy. Allen's hurt feelings on the whole subject are understandable, but we believe he is wrong to insist on an apology or to reconcile himself to lifetime estrangement from his brother. He should make a fight to save at least a portion of his once-happy relationship with his brother.

Misunderstandings concerning family financial affairs are common and if Allen has the right on his side he may very well convince his brother. If he is wrong in any way he would do well, for the sake of his own conscience, to clear the matter up. The brother may at this time be dominated by a conniving wife, but it is possible that as time goes on he'll begin to assert himself. If he is armed with correct information and knows that he stands on firm ground that he'll be able to talk up to his wife.

With a vicious woman in the background, it is doubtful whether happy social relations between these couples will ever exist. But it is to be hoped that the brothers can free themselves of suspicion and bad feeling toward one another.

SHIPBROKER DIES
London (UPI)—Ernest Simpson, 61, an American-born shipbroker who was divorced by his second wife who then married Britain's former King Edward VIII, died Sunday. The wealthy but retiring Simpson was catapulted into the limelight when his ex-wife Wallis married the British monarch, who abdicated and became the Duke of Windsor.
