

Row Brewing in Senate Committee Over Labor Racketeering Curb

Republicans Will Seek Provisions On Boycotts

Washington—(UPI)—The Senate Labor committee, long noted for its partisan wrangling, had a new row brewing today over what ground should be covered in legislation to curb labor racketeering.

Just about everyone favors such a bill.

But Republicans, led by Labor Secretary James P. Mitchell and Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) served notice Tuesday that they will demand provisions to deal with secondary boycotts and with coercive picketing. The latter is designed to compel recognition of a union without majority support.

Goldwater Offers Support
Goldwater, top GOP hold-over on the committee, and Mitchell made their separate statements after a conference in which Goldwater agreed to support the administration's reform bill. Both said that secondary boycotts and "blackmail" picketing must be included in an anti-racketeering bill.

Labor Subcommittee Chairman John F. Kennedy (D-Mass.) had just announced, however, that he would appoint a nine-man citizens study group to look into such amendments to the basic Taft-Hartley Labor law.

Goldwater told newsmen he had not heard of the new panel until he read about it in a newspaper. He said he was not necessarily opposed to the idea, although he would insist on some say on the panel's membership.

Secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing, Goldwater declared, should not be carried over for separate Taft-Hartley legislation. He said some agreement might be reached to defer some Taft-Hartley law proposals, adding, however, that the administration bill would contain some other proposals which amend the Taft-Hartley law.

The situation was reminiscent of the last congressional session when Senate Republicans fruitlessly tried to write controversial changes in the Taft-Hartley law into the so-called Kennedy-Ives labor reform bill. The senate passed that bill with only minor changes in the Taft-Hartley law but the measure died in the House.

Goldwater and Mitchell were divided in that controversy last year. The senator told newsmen Tuesday that both sides had made some concessions to clear the way for this year's united front.

Portland Zoo's Future in Doubt After Landslide

Portland—(UPI)—The future of Portland's new zoo was in doubt today after a landslide at the site of the $4 million project.

City Commissioner Ormond Bean called a conference of architects and engineers in his office at 3:30 p.m. today to consider the problem. The slide Monday night broke water, gas and sewer mains.

Bean said none of the new buildings were damaged, but he wanted to determine what the prospects are before spending any more construction funds.

Sliding Into Ravine
About 20 acres of the new zoo site appeared to be sliding slowly into a steep ravine. On the affected site were the new commissary and administration buildings, the cinder block hay barn now under construction, some of the paddocks for hoofed animals, and the giraffe barn.

The former golf clubhouse now occupied by Zoo Director Jack Marks has been damaged by one of the fault lines of the slide which apparently extended through the middle of the house, causing it to buckle.

Heavy excavations have been made by the State Highway Department at the south edge of the zoo site where Canyon rd. has been widened and an overpass built for an entrance to the new zoo. City engineers expressed belief this work may have caused the hill to start sliding.
