Algae Hold Two Possible Hopes For Man's Future

Washington - (Science Service) - Algae that "turn out" more oxygen and increase 1,000-fold in one day even at temperature as high as 100 degrees Fahrenheit hold two possible promises for man's future, Dr. Constantine Sorokin has reported.
With their more effective conversion of carbon dioxide into "organic products of great economic value" - low temperature algae increase only eight-fold in the same time period - we may actually see a revolution in agriculture, Dr. Sorokin said.

The protein in algae is the same, and as nutritious as that in meat. In future years, Dr. Sorokin, who is at the University of Maryland, predicted, we may be growing algae for food instead of crops that have remained basically the same throughout man's history as a farmer. However, he said, the algae will probably be processed chemically before being used as a food.
While some nations do not have a food shortage now, the use of algae as a source of human food is currently being intensively studied in places, such as Israel and Japan, where farming land is scarce. With the population that appears to be growing rapidly, even nations such as the United States with its food surplus may be interested in algae cultivation.

A second possible use for these fast-growing high temperature algae is as a photosynthetic gas exchanger. In closed places such as submarines, spaceships and dwellings which man will build on other planets, algae can maintain a proper balance between oxygen and carbon dioxide for indefinite periods of time as they carry out photosynthesis. In one hour, Dr. Sorokin said, one unit volume of high temperature algae produces 180 volumes of oxygen.

However, one unit volume of low-temperature algae evolves only 45 volumes of oxygen in one hour - one-fourth as much.
