Baltimore Oriole Has Complicated Nest

It just so happened that the colors of the coat-of-arms of an Irish peer who came to the new world to start a colony in Maryland were orange and black. The peer was Lord Baltimore and when he and his followers were established they were surprised to discover a colorful bird with a black, shiny upper part and wings, and a brilliant orange colored breast.

The bird had a pleasant voice and constructed an unusual, hammock-like nest that always hung from the very tip-end of a tree limb.

The bird was an oriole and inasmuch as its colors matched their leader's coat-of-arms, it was only natural that they should name the bird the Baltimore Oriole. The name was well chosen and it has stuck, in spite of other common names that various groups have tried to attach to it, such as Golden Robin, Hang-bird or Hammock-bird. The oriole thereby retains some little connection with early American history.

Swinging Structure
Few birds construct a more complicated nest than the female Baltimore Oriole. It is a swinging, gourd-shaped structure of bark, cobwebs and grass, with a widely flaring bottom. It hangs like a sack from the tip end of a tree—usually an elm. The nesting oriole, as well as the oriole babies when they are at last born, swing and sway, rock, rattle and roll with every wind that blows.

Because the nest is usually at the extreme end of a flexible and flimsy limb, the area of the sway is increased many-fold. The over-all movement becomes really great. In a strong wind, when the tree branches are dipping and swaying, the nest must at times swing in an arch as much as 15 feet. At times the nest must travel in an almost complete circle, like a ball on the end of a string.

What Do They Think?
It would be interesting to know what the baby birds think is happening the first time the wind blows after they are born. It must be a rare sensation, sometimes lasting throughout the entire night and day. But in spite of the high winds, the driving rains and the burning sun many oriole nests have been known to last for four or five years.

The oriole feeds almost exclusively on tent caterpillars, especially during the time she is feeding her young. After the young leave the nest they can only enjoy the remainder of the summer for a few weeks before they and their parents must leave on the long migration to Mexico and South America. Come spring, they return to the same or nearby elm tree where they were born to construct for themselves the hanging nest so typical of the Baltimore Oriole.

Baby Kidnapster Formally Charged

New York—(UPI)—Mrs. Asuncion Artiz, 24, has been formally charged with kidnaping infant Johnny Tavaraz, apparently because she hoped to hold her common-law husband by giving him a son.

The moaning Puerto Rican woman was taken by ambulance to the Roosevelt hospital prison ward for a physical examination immediately after the early morning booking. She complained of being ill and was spitting blood.

If convicted of kidnaping, Mrs. Ortiz can receive a sentence of 20 years to life in prison. The 29-day-old baby's parents, Jose and Doralisa Tavaraz, said they hoped Mrs. Ortiz would receive "a lot of assistance."

"But I can never forgive her for this deed she did," the 31-year-old, Dominican-born mother said.
