Sugar is Sweet.
Saccharin is Sweeter.

"Goodnight Sugar." If that's what you've been saying, you could have laid it on thicker had you said, "Goodnight Saccharin" when you left her at her front steps. You must have been intending to convey "all your love," for you thought she was "awfully sweet," and saccharin is just about five hundred times sweeter than sugar.

And, too, there seems to be just one kind of saccharin, a crystalline compound prepared from coal tar, and supposed to be half a thousand times sweeter than cane sugar. So, calling your loved one Saccharin instead of "Sugar," lends an individual distinction, for there are many kinds of sugar. There is cane, beet, palm, brown, powdered, grape, milk, and fruit sugar, to name a few. They are all sweet, but almost could be considered "sour" when compared to saccharin.

Juice of Plants
All sugar, or at least most all, is contained in the juice of certain plants; sap we call it. Maple sugar from maple trees, beet sugar from roots, and cane sugar from sugar cane, a member of the grass family. Honey is called grape sugar. Fruit sugar occurs in all sweet fruits; palm sugar, almost as dark colored as brown sugar, is derived from various kinds of palm trees; and naturally milksugar is found in the milk of animals.

Columbus brought some cane sugar over with him, but the people of Southern Asia had been using cane sugar for about three thousand years; while saccharin is relatively recent, being discovered by a German chemist about 75 years ago. It has no food value but it's sure sweet.

Maybe it's not important to know, but just on the off-chance you might want to clutter up your thinking processes, or start an argument, you can "throw a wrench in the works" by telling your friends there's a "left-handed sugar" as well as a "right-handed sugar." There sure is, for the chemical test for which sort of sugar you are monkeying with, is conducted by shooting a ray of polarized light through the sample in question.

To the Right-Cane

If the ray, when passing through the solution, turns to the right, it is cane sugar; but if the ray turns to the left when passing through, it's glucose, or grape sugar.

Therefore, stupid as it appears, dextrose is "right-handed sugar," and glucose is "left-handed sugar." The direction taken by the ray, and the degree of divergence, that is, the size of the angle, determines the kind and strength of the sample tested. The chemist merely dissolves a given amount of sugar in a given amount of water, and passes the polarized ray through the solution with a piece of equipment known as a "polariscope."

Without a "polariscope" you can't tell for sure whether the sugar you sweeten your coffee with is right, or left-handed, and really it doesn't make a crystal's worth of difference. "Bye now, see you tomorrow, Saccharin."
