Plan for a Lived-in Kitchen

by Ruth W. Lee, home-furnishings consultant; Decorator, Mary Brandt

THE LIVED-IN KITCHEN is coming into its own again, just as in Grandma's day. There's a big difference, though. Open planning makes possible step- and motion-saving by having the dining area adjoin an efficient preparation center.

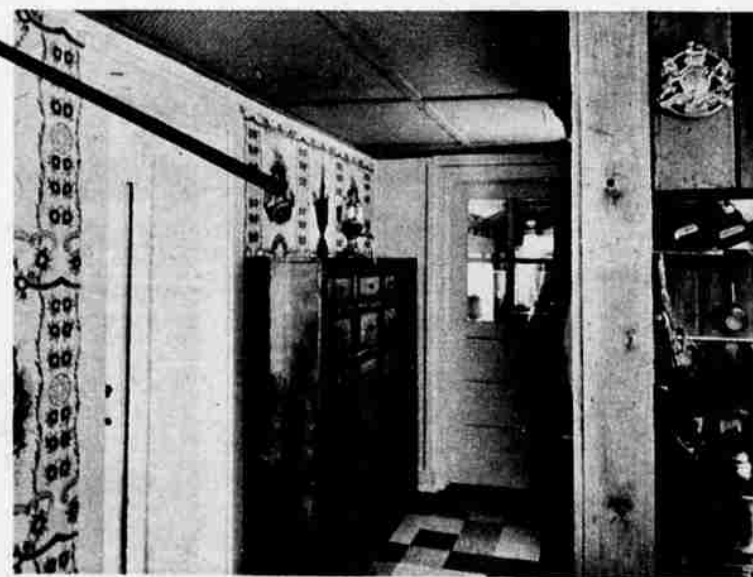

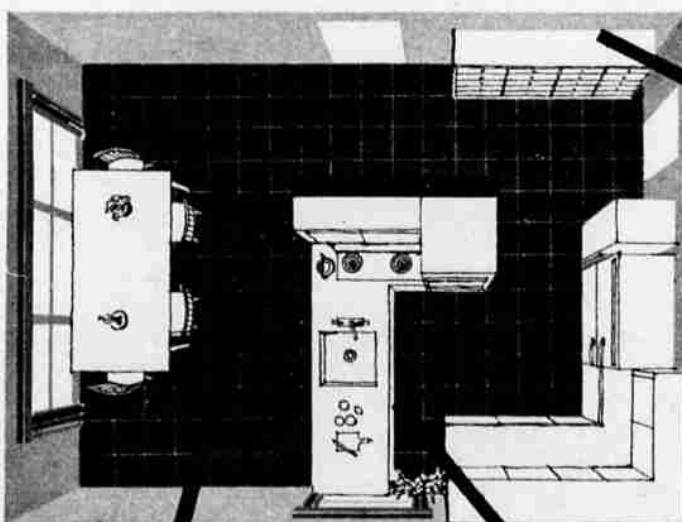

This requires decorative ideas which are integrated with the rest of the house.

The dining-kitchen area of this recently remodeled Connecticut farmhouse provides a fine example of what can be done to combine the practical and glamorous. Planned for maximum utility, the divider-counter is at good work and service height, with cooking top, sink, and drawers and cupboards beneath, accessible from either side.

Mellow knotty-pine cabinets complement the antique dining furniture. The provincial aura of the house is highlighted by ceiling and wall papers in appropriate motifs. Color is importantly used, too, for in contrast with the warm wood tones are the cool blue-greens of the patterned papers.

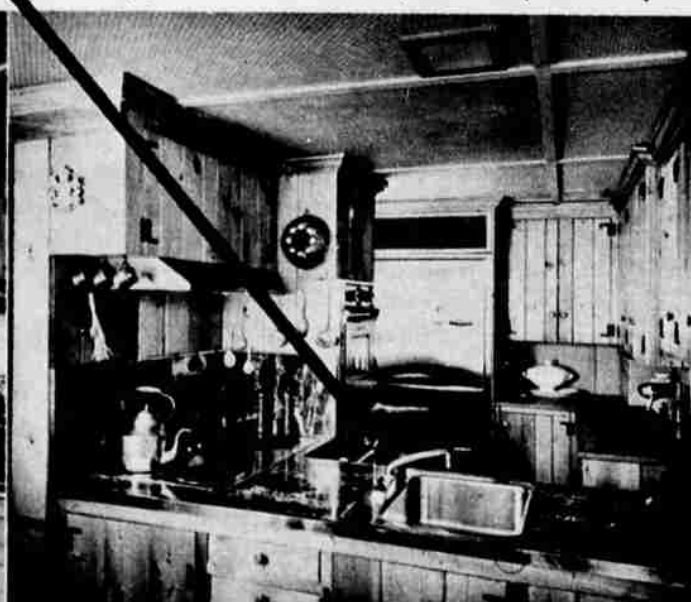

Such an all-purpose center provides a cheerful background for work, play, or relaxation.

An antique cabinet for linens and silver stands in passageway opposite Welsh dresser (not shown) with drop leaf for serving.

Echoing colors of dramatic scenic wallpaper, the tiny design on ceiling unifies entire kitchen-dining area.

Ample pine cupboards with wrought-iron hardware soften the metallic gleam of highly polished appliances.
