Charles Gustafson, administrator of Rogue Valley hospital, reviewed the history of hospitals and the Rogue Valley hospital in particular at the Tuesday meeting of the Medford Ministerial association. The meeting was held at the Salvation Army shelter.

The Corps serves breakfast, dinner and supper, he said, and during the past 12 months have served more than 9,000 meals and furnished beds for 4,000 persons. Work Required He mentioned that following supper each man is required to do a half hour of work at the shelter. During the business meeting of the association approved the designating of one Sunday in May as Bible History Sunday. During this Sunday the program of the Jackson County Board of Christian Education would be explained in the churches. Hours and speakers for the Good Friday service to be held March 27 at the First Assembly of God church were announced. The service will be held from 12 noon until 3 p.m. and is open to the public. The next meeting of the Ministerial association will be held April 14 at Church of the Brethren, 345 North Mary st.

Council of Churches Circulates Document

By LOUIS CASSELS United Press International Circulating among major Protestant denominations is a 32-page mimeographed "working paper" that may turn out to be one of the most significant documents of the year. Drafter by a special committee of the National Council of Churches, it is the first step toward a united Protestant stand on the thorny question: How should public schools deal with religion? Catholics and Jews long ago took firm—and directly opposite—positions on this issue. Catholics say public schools should forthrightly teach faith in God and obedience to moral laws. Jews say tax-supported institutions must follow a strict hands-off policy toward religion.

Council of Churches last year set up a Committee on Religion and Public Education, composed of representatives from 25 major Protestant bodies. This committee has taken on the formidable task of working out a policy statement that will be acceptable, if not to all Protestants, at least to a respectable number of them. The "working paper" is the first fruit of the committee's labors. Comment is being invited from the participating denominations. It doubtless will undergo considerable revision before it is presented for official adoption by the National Council. But even in its present preliminary form, it is a noteworthy document. Should Use Influence It asserts that public schools should use their influence to sustain the "basic view of life" held by most Americans—that God is, and that he is the creator and sustainer of human life and of all its precious values. The report recognizes that even this simple affirmation of God's existence would conflict with the beliefs of a small minority of Americans—about 4 per cent, according to census surveys—who classify themselves as atheists. But it says that it is "practically impossible" for public schools to "maintain a strict neutrality" on the question of God's existence. "The actual results of a studied neutrality is practical support for the view that God does not count."

It points out that there is no historical justification for any argument that the U.S. constitution requires such neutrality on the part of public institutions. The founding fathers did not hesitate to express their belief in God in the Declaration of Independence. And in every generation since, American government at all levels has professed belief in God—by opening courts and legislative sessions with prayer, by inspections on coins and currency, by providing chaplains for the armed forces, by exempting churches from taxation. While calling for a forthright acknowledgment of God in public schools, the Protestant document warns that "it is probably not possible for the public schools to go much farther than this" without violating "our cherished American principles of separation of church and state."

"The public schools cannot corporately be committed to the Christian God," the report says. "The Jewish child must in no way be embarrassed for his Judaism. No preferment, overt or implied, of one religious establishment over another should be tolerated for a single school session."

At 3 p.m. Sunday a membership class is held for youth at the church study, The M.Y.F. meets at 7 p.m. at the church with counselor, Leon Myers. Inquirer's class for adults meets on Wednesday at 7:30 p.m. Visitors are welcome at the services.
