Hugh D'Autremont's Bitterness Changes To Bewilderment

Oregon penitentiary and placed under the jurisdiction of the California Parole system. They have certain rules. He could not take a job immediately—any job. First he must get a feeling of supervised freedom outside. He was installed in an inexpensive downtown hotel room, from which he could go out for walks, get acquainted with the city. He must report to his parole officer each day.

Marriage was out of the question for 60 days. He must wait a month before he would be eligible to join a union—a residence requirement.

Finally came his interview with prospective employers. Several seemed impressed. He was hired by one of the best—provided he was accepted by the union. The first stumbling block. The union business agent stalled about accepting him. Hugh had been advised by his parole officer not to mention his penitentiary background. After all, Hugh had paid his debt to society, the officer argued. His penitentiary background had nothing to do with his skill, his qualifications. Hugh kept his mouth shut. The business agent grew tight lipped, suspicious. Others wanted that job. Hope was fading.

"How come," the business agent finally blurted out, "you never bothered to join our union before? You are not young. You claim all this experience?"

"Take another look at my name," said D'Autremont, his eyes steady, but hope sunk down to his shoe soles.

Recognition of Famous Name Dawns

"Oh—of course." The dawn of recognition turned to compassion, acceptance. The official paved the way with employees on the job. No further questions were asked. Everyone was helpful, friendly, kind.

"It was a wonderful job... I was determined to make good... do more than my share... prove myself."

He had been working six days. On St. Valentine's day he was thinking of those heart-shaped boxes of candy in the drug store window on the way to work—or maybe a bunch of violets at the flower stall.

Suddenly without warning, a great weight came into his chest. It was hard to breathe. It grew harder. He got through the day. He managed to get home. The next day he was in the hospital. There was internal bleeding. He was in the TB ward. The tests were negative. The kidneys were involved—one was enlarged. Tests... moves from wing to wing, ward to ward... biopsies, x-rays... deep, excruciating, debilitating pain.

The case is "critical." The young doctors are kind. They like Hugh D'Autremont. He is patient, appreciative, undemanding.

What are his thoughts today, aside from the pain, the "diabolical timing" that snatched freedom, hopes and dreams from him after this first brief savor?

D'Autremont's Thoughts, Memories

The way the sunlight filtered through those big, green trees at Jacksonville... how his mother would always come toward him with a smile, no matter what... his senior year at Artesia High school where he was a championship debater, leading actor in school plays... "senior most likely to succeed" inscription in the school annual... dreams of becoming a lawyer... blind worship of two older brothers that led him into a nightmare of tragedy... the dragging minutes, hours and days of 31 years in a state penitentiary.

"So many friends have appeared—out of the blue—since I've been here," he said. Some I'd forgotten even. Fellow showed up yesterday... "Hi, Hugh, remember me," he said. I tried, but couldn't. He has a bad heart—won't live long, but he'd come all the way out on a bus to see me... A reminiscence smile. "Last time I'd seen him he was a sophomore at Artesia High—I was a senior."

The visiting hour was drawing to a close. Nurses gave dismissal glances through the doorway. A bell was ringing down the hallway.

"I was bitter at first... now I'm bewildered... seems so senseless, happening like this... I try to pray... to hope... goodbye... and thank my friends for their prayers."

Small Worlds Around Us

By Lynn M. Watkins

The Horse Knew the Way

The Automobile Doesn't

...and through the woods to grandmother's house we go; the horse knows the way, to carry the sleigh, through the white and drifting snow. The song is traditional, everyone has heard it many times. But it speaks of a day that has passed. Today nearly everything is different.

We still go "to grandmother's house," and at times and in certain places, the snow is "white and drifting," but we ride in smooth comfort, in an automobile. The old horse, who knew the way, has been misplaced or displaced and in his passing something has been lost for the stupid automobile, no matter how many times it makes the trip, never knows enough to go back over the way by itself.

The car, regardless of its lustre, speed, smoothness and luxury doesn't know a single thing. It has no horse-sense or any other intelligence; no reasoning, not even the faintest shred of instinct. It is dumb and stupid.

Not 20 Feet

Unlike the old horse, the dumb automobile wouldn't go 20 feet without ramming itself into a tree, or building and wrecking itself. The difference between flesh and fabric is very great. Between the animate and the inanimate is a gulf so wide and deep it never will be bridged.

The car, regardless of its original cost or the bright, shiny chrome, with which it is bedecked, is merely a series of cogs, wheels, bolts, valves, steel, glass and gadgets that just don't add up to a single, solitary thought or idea. The human hand that controls it, or puts the pieces together into a pile of organized junk, is a billion times more complex and wonderful than the machine it created.

So often we make almost an idol of the machine. We point with conceit and colossal ego to the wonderful things we construct and invent saying in effect, "Look at the marvels we have created." We gaze in misplaced awe at the imagined wonders of a machine and forget that none of them is worth the space they occupy unless there is a living being to push the button or pull the lever.

No Thought

None of them or all of them put together, never had or ever will have a single thought. None are capable of any act without the guiding hand of a thinking being. The old animal that pulled the sleigh or the plow did have a little more than a "horse sense" and he, with his mind, however shallow it may have been served many purposes of which no machine is capable.

The old-time country doctor made his rounds with his faithful horse. When the last ailing human patient was treated, the tired doctor laid back in the buggy, or the Welfare Offices In New Building

The Jackson county welfare commission moved to new quarters at the corner of Fourth and Grape sts., during the week end, it was reported today.

The commission has had offices in the Leverette building at West Main and Grape sts. for many years. Entrance to the new commission office is on Fourth st.

Approximately 1,000 square feet more space is available at the new location, where there are 11 rooms under lease.

It is the first organization to move to the new Wilson-McCabe building. The Oregon state tax commission's local office is expected to move there March 31, it was reported. Another government agency, is also expected to occupy space in the building.

Consideration for Higher Taxes Urged

Washington (UPI)—President Eisenhower's chief economic adviser says Congress should consider hiking taxes if it increases the administration's $77-billion balanced budget.

Dr. Raymond J. Saulnier, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, said that a budget balanced would help get the nation's unemployed back to work faster.

In another economic development, two members of the Senate Finance committee agreed that the United States would have trouble raising money to pay for a war over Berlin because of the huge national debt.

Sen. Wallace F. Bennett (R-Utah) said that "if Berlin should touch off trouble, it would be very difficult to start to finance another war from this high level" of the $280 billion national deficit.

Stocks Suffer First Dip Since Feb. 9

New York (UPI)—Stocks today suffered their first decline of consequence since Feb. 9 when the industrial average broke 7.87 points.

Today's losses brought the average down more than five points at the low. Like the Feb. 9 drop, Wall Street had nothing more to offer except that the drop was technical, brought on by normal profit-taking after a long period of rise had lifted prices to a record high on average.

But today's losses may have been inspired by selling brought on by the latest moves of the Federal Reserve System to curtail use of credit in the stock market.

The heaviest losses came into some of the recently strong special issues. Leaders also were forced down but their declines were smaller. American Telephone turned a loss of nearly two points into a loss of more than two points. Autos, steels, oils and rails eased.

Higher prices for the metal here and in London gave the coppers a lift for a time but they slipped back to net losses.
