Ports of Entry Being Checked in Influenza Hunt

Washington, (Science Service)—How can we derail the flu bug that is picking up steam in Europe and threatening to chug across the Atlantic to this country? It cannot be turned back at ports of entry like an unwanted alien, but the U. S. Public Health Service is doing the next best thing. Quarantine officers are examining all persons arriving by ship and air, both American and foreign citizens, for symptoms of influenza.

Those cases discovered will either be hospitalized or directed to their own physicians. Can't Stem Outbreaks

Dr. William J. Zukel of the U. S. Surgeon General's office said such port of entry detection will be helpful but is not capable of completely stemming the expected sporadic outbreaks here.

Detection of incipient flu, Dr. Zukel explained, is complicated by the two-to seven-day incubation periods of the viruses. Air passengers travel at such speed that they can carry latent viruses across the ocean and not show influenza symptoms until "safe" at home. Three- and four-day ship crossings also cut down the number of detectable cases.

The best preventive measure is vaccination. Two shots between four and six weeks apart should protect between 65 per cent and 75 of the people taking them. The immunizations are probably good for somewhat less than a year.

Vaccinations Urged

The Public Health Service urges pregnant women, the aged and persons with heart diseases and diabetes to be vaccinated at once. Such groups are especially susceptible to influenza and its potentially severe complications.

Since last year's Asian flu epidemic, PHS scientists have been investigating the long-term effects on the children of mothers who were stricken during pregnancy. Dr. Zukel said the studies must run for years before any significant results can be found.
