Clothing Display Proves New Styles Aren't New

By GAY PAULEY
UPI Women's Editor
New York—UPI—Around New York:

To show that there is nothing new under the sun or in fashion, the Brooklyn museum this week put on a nostalgic exhibit of clothes like grandmothers used to wear.

Granda, for those too young to recall, wore puffy sleeves, shirt-waist dresses and separates, just as her fashionable offspring is this spring.

The museum exhibit features 13 costumes from the 1890s, when Charles Dana Gibson in his drawings established a debonair girl with a flair which all fashionable women of the period tried to copy.

The Gibson Girl's shirt-waist dress was a major contribution to fashion; it has been a favorite through the years and this season is back in every imaginable variation. Shirts and skirts - separates, we call 'em these days - also began with the Gibson Girl, said the museum. And the huge, puffed sleeves, and general width across the top of the bodice are copied throughout spring and summer collections here and abroad.

There is one outstanding difference between today's and 1890's fashion plate. Gibson Girl skirts dusted the floor.

A new report on clothing costs for the high school and college girls is enough to make parents wish for all boys.

One magazine catering to the teen set - Seventeen, reported this week that this group, going back to high school or college, spent $837 million on apparel alone in September and October, 1958. The publication which for the first time made a study of high school spending, found that this market of four mil-
