

Truman Sees Foreign Ministers' Meeting as Vital To Progress

Noise at Cocktail Parties Contradicts Scientific Principle

By DELOS SMITH
UPI Science Editor

New York—One scientist's scientific observation at cocktail parties is that the noise "is practically uniform in the center of the pack, but drops off directly at the edge or corners of the room." That would be all very well except it contradicts a scientific principle.

The principle is that "when there is a diffuse sound field in an enclosed space, the sound pressure level increases three decibels at the boundary," said Dr. Howard C. Hardy, an acoustical scientist from Chicago. He lamented that science seems to understand little about the noise and other phenomena generated among people by martinis and closeness.

He called for a real scientific effort to get the answers and suggested a young scientist could make such a study the basis for his doctorate. He'd had to be dedicated, of course, Hardy said in making his suggestion to the Acoustical Society of America, because it "may be difficult to preserve the proper attitude of scientific detachment."

Miss Robinson Has Articles Printed

Ashland - Two articles by Miss Helene M. Robinson, acting chairman of the Southern Oregon college music department, are in the current issue of the Oregon Music Educator.

"How Can We Teach For Excellence?" defends the goal of excellence for music students. In this article, Miss Robinson affirms that "teaching for excellence is not easy. There are no short cuts; and there is no tradition of excellence in America as there is in older European countries."

By maintaining a conviction that it is worthwhile and a faith that students can achieve it, excellence can and will be obtained.

Good planning, accuracy, technical skill, interpretation, intensive study, creativity, performance, and leadership are the contributing factors in leading to the achievement of excellence in musicianship according to the article.

Miss Robinson's second contribution cites the values accruing to music students who join and actively participate in their professional organization, the Music Educators National Conference.

Geneva Meeting Should Be More Than Maneuver

I am inclined to believe that clamor for meetings at the "summit" has been in part due to the impression that negotiations with anyone other than the President are useless and inconclusive. Now that we have a conditional commitment for another meeting at the "summit" I hope that the coming meeting of the foreign ministers in Geneva, with the new Secretary of State participating, will make it clear that he is the direct instrument of the President and that useful decisions and understandings can be reached in dealing through him. And if there is to be a "summit" meeting, preparations by the foreign ministers are vital to any hope for progress and achievement there.

If all critical issues were to be deferred for discussion and final settlement at a meeting of the heads of state, we would find ourselves in a hopeless jam and in an impossible position.

Special Opinion
In my opinion, in view of all that has transpired in the past weeks, the meeting at Geneva takes on special importance and should be more than a maneuver or just a technical procedure leading to a meeting of the heads of state.

If the meetings at Geneva first faces up to the immediate critical issues and is conducted in good faith, it will have an important bearing on whether there can be any basis for success at the "summit" and on the prospects for peace. I hope that what happens at Geneva will enable us to continue talks with the Russians in our efforts to save the peace.

If the forthcoming visit of the Vice President to Moscow can help in some way, and if it provides the Kremlin with an opportunity to clear some of the air, then I am all for it. The Vice President not only will carry with him the prestige of his office, but will go as a special instrument of the President.

Should Premier Khrushchev indicate that he, himself, would like to visit Washington, it might be well to encourage him. I think Khrushchev needs first-hand exposure to the United States and a good look at it to balance off his over-assessment of what his missiles and industrial might can do to frighten us.

Couldn't Risk Trip
I tried to persuade Stalin to visit the United States on several occasions, but I was led to understand that he could not risk the trip because of the situation at home.

But after my own trip to Potsdam and the previous trips of Roosevelt to meet Stalin, I felt that there was no longer any sense for an American president to meet the Russian dictators at their convenience and thought it was high time they came to meet with us here.

We traveled great distances to show that even as a leading power we did not insist upon anyone coming to see us on our own grounds. Dictators have a way of summoning spokesmen of other nations either to bully or beguile them into surrender or false security.

Moscow, as the capital of the Communist world, has staged meetings of satellites, neighbors and so-called neutrals intended to propagandize the notion that all roads lead to Moscow.

Seat in Kremlin
From time to time some members of the Kremlin have travelled to Peiping to placate the Red Chinese dictators, in recognition of that country's rapidly developing power and its position as a possible rival. But the seat of the Communist and satellite world continues to be physically in Moscow and in the Kremlin.

I often wondered why Nehru, whom I regard as one of the most intelligent of our modern world leaders, failed to sense the folly of his neutralism in the face of such overwhelming evidence of Communist intentions to dominate the free world.

I could understand the plight of India geographically and economically, and, when President, I did everything I could to extend assistance to India. But when the free world was confronted with brutal attacks by the Communists in several critical areas, I found little understanding and no support and even open criticism from Nehru in our actions to defend ourselves against aggression.

Quotes From the News

By UNITED PRESS INTERNATIONAL

New York—Harry Truman, lecturing at Columbia university: "I was raised a politician—from the precinct to president, and I'm proud to be a politician."

Houston, Tex.—Fidel Castro, complaining about the police and the press: "My mind needs rest. I am not criticizing. I want to be here as a visitor, not as some strange man. Too many policemen, microphones, cameras. I am almost blind."

Montgomery, Ala.—Convict Earl Phillips, recaptured after a prison break: "I tried to get free because I have been deprived of everything that a human wants. I thought I would get out and get some of it. Everybody else is getting it."

Cambridge, Mass.—Philip Smythe, bank manager, foiling an attempted holdup by telling the robber: "You're not kidding me. Now go away and don't bother me."

Though sorely tried, we never lost patience with India even when our pleas for cooperation were steadily rejected. This situation was exploited by the Russians with serious damage to the free world.

Time To Add Weight
Today Nehru is confronted, right on his own doorstep, with the most blatant act of Communist imperialism, Red China's attack in Tibet. I know the dilemma and the dangers that face Nehru, but I suggest that the time has come for him to add his weight and influence against the international Communist aggressors.

The Communists have shown that they have utter contempt for the weak and the neutrals, and no lasting peace is possible if we forget this.

International communism is forever probing for weak spots. It is constantly seeking to drive a wedge between the free nations. It is now trying to split the Allies on several issues, and we must not permit this to happen.

Voices Raised
I regret that recently in Britain voices were raised in petulant criticism of American policy which might better have been conveyed through official channels and which served no purpose except to provide the Kremlin with propaganda material.

As Allies, we must keep each other fully informed and never give the false impression that we are drifting apart. If we should, in fact, permit anything, however provoking, to separate any of the Allies, it would expose us all to great harm.

And here at home I would counsel that we act as a united people in the serious days ahead of us.

Elkins Wiretap Conviction Upheld

San Francisco —(UPI)—The wiretap convictions of James B. Elkins and Raymond F. Clark of Portland, Ore., were upheld Monday by the U. S. Court of Appeals here.

The two were convicted in a Federal Court trial in Portland in 1957. Elkins received a 20-month sentence and Clark a six-month sentence. Both were also fined. Imposition of the sentence was upheld pending appeal.

Walter Evans, their attorney, said in Portland he would have to read the opinion by the court before deciding if further appeal would be made.

Disclosures by Elkins touched off the 1956 Portland vice probe.
