The Medical Roundup

Infectious Mononucleosis

Many anxious parents want to know what is infectious mononucleosis, and what can be done about it. Will their child get well? I was just reading a good paper on the subject by Drs. W. R. Mason Jr., and Elizabeth K. Adams of Atlanta, Ga.

First, I should say that infectious mononucleosis is a disease usually of young people. It behaves something like an infection that is self-limited, or in other words, clears up by itself. The acute symptoms usually last for a few weeks. The most common finding is an enlargement of the lymph nodes in the sides of the neck. Sometimes there is a sore throat, but enough to cause a little trouble in swallowing. Sometimes there is some injury to the liver, demonstrable by tests. Often there is a loss of appetite, some gastrointestinal disturbance, and a feeling of being below par.

The diagnosis is usually made from a study of the blood. Mononucleosis means that there appear in the blood many cells of the type which have only one nucleus in the center. Perhaps over half of the white blood cells will be what are called lymphocytes and some of them will be atypical. In many cases, there appears in the blood what is called a positive heterophil antibody.

Unfortunately, as yet, the cause of the disease is unknown. It is not even known if the illness is contagious. Naturally, then, there is no specific treatment; that is, there is no drug which we doctors can count on to speed up the recovery of the patient.

Later, on removing the bandage, he allegedly shows the patient the egg-membrane

Of late, I have wondered why so many people have been writing me to ask for the name of the medicine that will dissolve cataracts. I have had to answer that I do not know of any such medicine.

The only way to get rid of a ripe cataract is to have it removed surgically by an ophthalmologist. Now, I read in the American Medical Association News that they have just arrested in Missouri, on fraud charges, a certain R. Conner who, they say, for years, has been fleecing people by claiming that he can dissolve cataracts. When consulted by a person with any type of failing vision he is reported to say, "You have cataracts developing." It is reported that after putting into the eyes his so-called radium water, he covers the eyes with a bandage into which he has slipped a piece of membrane from an egg-shell.
