Doctors Should Be Prepared To Treat Snake Bite

Chicago (Science Service)—Summer is the season for increased outdoor activities—and snake bites.

The number of such victims may increase as outdoor activities such as camping become more popular, two Philadelphia physicians warned here.

Most cases of snake bite occur in the southern and southwestern states where there are more snakes and the conditions favor greater exposure. However, all states except Maine and Alaska harbor poisonous snakes.

Must Be Prepared

Therefore, all physicians must be prepared to treat poisonous snake bites, Drs. Thomas McCreary and Harold Wurzel of the Hospital of the University of Pennsylvania, reminded colleagues in the Journal of the American Medical Association.

As many as 3,000 snake bites per year have been estimated for the United States alone. Only 10 to 20 of these prove fatal, however.

There are at least 35 species or subspecies of poisonous snakes in this country, the doctors pointed out. Most of these are pit vipers or Crotalidae, which include the copperhead and the cottonmouth or water moccasin. The coral snake, found in southern states, is a relative of the cobra and is not a pit viper.

Not Aggressive
The Crotalidae are generally nocturnal in their habits and are dangerous whether on land or in water. Yet, they are not aggressive and only strike for food or in self defense.

The doctors listed a number of factors that affect the seriousness of a snake bite. They include:

1. Age; the young and old are more susceptible to serious aftermath.
2. Site of the bite; snake bites are less dangerous on an extremity than near a vital organ.

3. Early treatment; the earlier, the better.

Their advice for the victim that is bitten far from a doctor's office includes the application of a tourniquet (to close off the superficial lymphatics to lessen the spread of the venom); incision and suction at the site of the bite, and a dose of antivenin from a physician when available.

Space Pioneer Role Appealing

Washington (Science Service)—Suppose the National Aeronautics and Space Administration had chosen you to be one of 110 candidates for the job of riding the first manned satellite into black, empty, silent, star-studded space. How would you have felt?

This happened to 110 carefully screened military test pilots who were brought to Washington for indoctrination. After the project had been described to them NASA called for volunteers. How many do you suppose responded?

Nearly 80 per cent of the men said they would like to try for the job, NASA's chief, Dr. T. Keith Glennan, told a meeting here of the Aviation Writers association. That means about 88 men volunteered.

From this group, a more select group of 30 will be chosen for further training, then an even more select one of 12 will provide the most physically and psychologically perfect man for the flight. This national hero will not be named until the day of the launching. He will be the man adjudged to be in the best physical and mental shape on the day of launching.
