These are the only conditions which foreign governments should be required to meet for diplomatic recognition by the United States. Recognition of foreign nations should have no moral or social implications.

The United States has followed several patterns of recognition during its history, all of which have added to the present confusion. Up to the time of the Civil War, the United States recognized any country as soon as it came into being.

Then a gradual change took place during the years between the Civil War and World War I. The U. S. began a policy requiring that countries desiring recognition have governments which were "sanctioned by their people." This was particularly true in regard to the countries of Central and South America where new governments were coming into power through revolutions. In addition, the U. S. required that these countries "work for peace and harmony among the other nations of the world."

Following World War I, the U. S. was faced with new problems. Japan's conquests in the Far East led to the policy of non-recognition in the case of her conquests. The U. S. did not recognize countries which violated the Kellogg-Briand Pact. And about this same time came the problem of recognition of the new government in Russia. The U. S. held that the new Communist government did not have the consent of the people and thus refused to recognize it. But because of the turn of events prior to World War II, the U. S. finally did extend recognition to the U. S. S. R.

The U. S. necessarily refused recognition of the new regimes set up by the conquests of Germany and Japan during World War II. The problems surrounding the recognition of Red China fall somewhat in the same category, as the Red regime was set up through defeat of a government which the U. S. is pledged to support.

The U. S. has stuck by this policy. It is now in the position of supporting a government which actually controls only a small island, Formosa, while Red China, which rules the entire Chinese mainland, is steadfastly refused recognition. In addition, the U. S. has refused recognition to some of the Russian satellites in Eastern Europe.

And yet, with this policy, the United States still recognizes and deals with Russia, whose form of government is essentially the same as that of these other countries to which recognition is denied, supposedly because of their Communist governments.

Complications Seen
It would appear that trying to use recognition as a tool to get what we want could bring about more complications and bad publicity on the international scene. The United States could recognize a Communist government, as it has in the case of Russia, and still continue a policy aimed at world peace.

The problem of recognition is certain to remain a major diplomatic issue in the future, especially with the strong surge of nationalism sweeping through Asia and Africa. The recognition of new nations and governments must be consistent with the democratic principles upon which our own government is based.

Rather than take each problem as it arises, a recognition policy based primarily on the simple fact of the existence of a government would be far better in maintaining the reputation of the U. S. throughout the world.

The far greater problems of peaceful existence of the nations of the world could then be examined in the "open air" through free contacts with other nations. The U. S. will gain little by refusing to recognize and deal with nations whose governments may not coincide with our principles in foundation and practice.

THE NEED FOR A CONCRETE RECOGNITION POLICY

By Robert Lindsay
Recognition of foreign government by the United States has become highlighted as an important issue by the case of Red China.

Just how did recognition become a problem and what can the United States do to solve it?

The simplest way to solve this problem would be to set up a definite policy for recognition which would require only the following:

1. That the government of the nation seeking recognition by the U. S. be in control of its country, and

2. That the government in question be willing and able to carry out any international obligations.

Only Conditions
These are the only conditions which foreign governments should be required to meet for diplomatic recognition by the United States. Recognition of foreign nations should have no moral or social implications.

The United States has followed several patterns of recognition during its history, all of which have added to the present confusion. Up to the time of the Civil War, the United States recognized any country as soon as it came into being.

Then a gradual change took place during the years between the Civil War and World War I. The U. S. began a policy requiring that countries desiring recognition have governments which were "sanctioned by their people." This was particularly true in regard to the countries of Central and South America where new governments were coming into power through revolutions. In addition, the U. S. required that these countries "work for peace and harmony among the other nations of the world."

Following World War I, the U. S. was faced with new problems. Japan's conquests in the Far East led to the policy of non-recognition in the case of her conquests. The U. S. did not recognize countries which violated the Kellogg-Briand Pact. And about this same time came the problem of recognition of the new government in Russia. The U. S. held that the new Communist government did not have the consent of the people and thus refused to recognize it. But because of the turn of events prior to World War II, the U. S. finally did extend recognition to the U. S. S. R.

The U. S. necessarily refused recognition of the new regimes set up by the conquests of Germany and Japan during World War II. The problems surrounding the recognition of Red China fall somewhat in the same category, as the Red regime was set up through defeat of a government which the U. S. is pledged to support.

The U. S. has stuck by this policy. It is now in the position of supporting a government which actually controls only a small island, Formosa, while Red China, which rules the entire Chinese mainland, is steadfastly refused recognition. In addition, the U. S. has refused recognition to some of the Russian satellites in Eastern Europe.

And yet, with this policy, the United States still recognizes and deals with Russia, whose form of government is essentially the same as that of these other countries to which recognition is denied, supposedly because of their Communist governments.
