I WAS JUST THINKING ...

... IF I WERE as tall as the cloud, I would cradle this place in my arms, but there would be no greater sense of ownership than now.

Great wealth will never be mine and here are few of the material things which all of us crave and which, in honesty, I also desire.

Yet to relinquish this for luxury and prestige would be a sacrifice.

Here beneath the sighing branches is a broad stone on which to sit with the feet resting gently on the blanket of pine needles. The trees hold an undulant orchestra of blackbirds. The afternoon sun is my gold.

Here in my kingdom the only struggle is the fight of bird and beast and bug for survival. Even that, because it is instinct, seems gentle.

Sometimes I think it might have been better to be born in times when life was less complex, when man's pleasures were of his own creation, his battle only for himself and those dear to him. Yet life was no less complex then; there were merely other dangers, other disasters we are now too highly civilized to survive. The complexity of life began beyond the Garden. It will end only with the world's end.

In this corner of the world, there is no beginning and no end for me. This stone may have awaited my coming for centuries or only since day before yesterday. The pines were here before my birth and will outlast me. My coming and going will be marked only by the patter of needles on the dank earth and a whisper through the branches.

It is good to long for what is not mine, if longing inspires me to grow. But in this sanctuary of shadow and sunlight, in this solemn happiness, all longing is swept away and all the marks of dissatisfaction.

I will never gain the world nor even more than a fragment of what it offers. Yet in this miniature monarchy, I own it all.
